As may be inferred from the title, what Mr. Bennett saw, thought, and heard was not of a piece with the commonplace of European travel. Prior to attending the Congress he made several visits to interesting points between Liverpool and Brussels, and at the close of its sessions he resumed his travels, taking in several important cities, where his Freethinking instincts led him to view localities and recall events of local association which are not visited or reflected upon by the stereotyped style of the Yankee abroad who puts his trip into type. The combination in Mr. Bennett of Yankee and Infidel makes his book especially interesting to a Freethinker.

Speaking of the Rev. Newland Maynard, one of his fellow-passengers, Mr. Bennett describes him pleasantly, and says: "I'll venture he has but slight faith in the superstitions and flummeries of religion, and believes in making life pleasant and jolly. . . . I doubt very much whether he really has any more faith in the huge nonsense than I hav."

While in Paris a phase of the morality of the wicked city was brought to his attention in the case of an American residing at a hotel, who, having a companion without conferring the title or dignity of wifehood upon her, was ejected; and remonstrating that he thought in Paris a man had a right to do what he pleased, was informed that if his room had opened on the court it would hav made no difference, but as it opened on the street the proprieties must be observed.

Following is from Mr. Bennett's description of a visit to Voltaire's mansion: "We were shown into his private rooms, where he used to write, perhaps, his 'Philosophical Dictionaries,' his 'Commentaries on the Bible,' his 'Pocket Theology,' and others of his nearly one hundred volume—historical, dramatic, theological, and philosophical. We saw his arm-chair, his bed, and the mausoleum intended by the Marchioness de Villette to contain his heart, which nevertheless lies with his body in the Pantheon at Paris. Around the rooms are nearly two dozen paintings, some of his near friends, and others being fancy, poetical, and classical pieces, but no crucified gods or sour-looking saints. . . . Benjamin Franklin and George Washington were also there. . . . Two or three busts of the great writer were in the room—one life-size and the others smaller."

On his departure from London for home the leading Freethinkers of England tendered Mr. Bennett a farewell supper, at which were present, besides a large company of others, Charles Bradlaugh, M.P., Annie Besant, Dr. Drysdale, and Dr. Aveling. Complimentary speeches were made and a beautiful illuminated address was presented to the guest by the National Secular Society of England. Following is a selection from the address, which bears Bradlaugh's signature as president: "Without free speech no search for truth is possible; without free speech no discovery of truth is useful; without free speech progress is checked and the nations no longer march forward toward the nobler life which the future holds for man. Better a thousandfold abuse of free speech than a denial of free speech. The abuse dies in a day; the denial slays the life of the people and entombs the hope of the race."

Mr. Bennett's book, though crude in composition, owing to the fact that the letters were not revised after their first publication, is a contribution to the history of Freethought, and as a book of travel in well-known places it covers ground and presents personal experiences of an interesting character entirely and agreeably novel to the reader of the ordinary run of books on European tours.

Letters from Friends.

NELSON, KAN., Feb. 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Put me down for $5 if you make that expected trip around the world.

WM. B. BRISBINE.

HAVERHILL, MASS., Feb. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You can count on a mite from me when you get ready to start around the globe.

Yours truly, J. M. ORDWAY.

MT. HURON, N. Y., Feb. 5, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Your friend A. Boughton has just requested me to inform you that he is quite anxious (as well as myself) to hav one man go round the world who is not afraid to speak the truth, and you can count on him for five dollars for the round trip. Yours, etc., GEO. SMITH.

LUMBER CITY, PA., Feb., 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please place me down as a subscriber of $5.00 to aid you in your tour around the world. When you get enough subscribers let me know, and the above subscription will be forwarded.

Send me by mail two copies of "The Darwins," one copy of "An Infiel Abroad," and a photograph of Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker. Yours truly,

THOMAS KIRK.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Jan. 31, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Put me down for five dollars to aid you on your trip around the world. I know I will get ten times the value in your writing. I take THE TRUTH SEEKER through Mr. Ashman of this city, and I like it and am a genuin Infidel and a helper in the cause of common sense and liberty. Let me know when you want the "V" and I will remit.

Yours very truly, JOHN P. MEAKIN.

FARMER CITY, ILL., Feb, 2, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed I send you draft for three dollars for the paper for another year.

Your European letters were keenly appreciated, and we think your proposed voyage around the world would be a grand move for Liberalism. Your European trip has demonstrated the proposition that D. M. Bennett can do more work, and better, in a given time than any other living man. It is not likely you can make the voyage in so grand a style nor be ovated by so many grand scallawags as Gen. Grant was; but then you can do a work a thousandfold more valuable to mankind than was his. Where Gen. Grant saw nothing worthy of note to his countrymen, you can open a mine of wealth to yours. Gen. Grant's object was, among other things of less importance, to learn by observation how to govern and control men more perfectly. Yours will be to teach men how to more perfectly govern themselvs.

Go by all means, and when you are ready call on me for a five to help you on your journey. I hav the promis of two or three more fives from other parties who will want your book of travels.

Yours for around the world, D. W. SMITH.

WHITE ROCK, Nev., Feb. 2, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I should hav written to you long ago, but scarcity of coin prevented me, and as I am entered on your books a life subscriber, I presume you rested easy on my delay. Of course every Liberal in the country wants you to make the trip around the world, and all that are able will advance the five dollars to hav a chance to read your interesting letters.

Inclosed find $11.50—$5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881, and "Nature's Revelations of Character;" $1.50 for "Infidel Abroad," and $5 for the trip around the world. If you don't go I shall want some other books for the $5. I hope you will be able to go, for I think mankind in general will be benefited by it.

Fraternally yours, V. J. BORRETTE.

MARMORA, ONT., Jan. 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am very glad you hav had such an enjoyable time in your European tour, and I am sure all those who hav read your letters hav enjoyed your description of what you saw and did. I enjoyed them thoroughly, as they carried me back to my boyhood days when I employed myself rambling among many of the scenes visited by you. Traveling is always fascinating and enjoyed whether wandering among the scenes of art, with its sublime conception of what might be, or feasting your eyes on the grander beauties of nature, with its beautiful conceptions of what now is. Lovers of nature and art can realize in their mind's eye the picturesque descriptions you hav therein given of the places visited, and thus revisit in spirit those which they cannot but would willingly do in the body also.

If there is any prospect of your making a tour of the world as proposed, you may set me down as one who will advance the $5 necessary as per proposition. Should the idea be carried out, I would suggest that the work be illustrated (if the cost be not too great) with gems of the wonders in architecture, of temples, palaces, buildings, scenery, etc., etc., as may prove interesting. By all means pay particular attention to Egypt, China, and Hindostan. Visit the caves and temples of Elephanta, Deccan, Ellora, and others of India; the temples of Thebes, Palmyra, Fadmor, Babylon, and many others; the great pyramids, the tombs of the kings, and other works of nations who are said to hav been uncivilized and without knowledge. Investigate critically their surroundings, and giv us the best light on their growth and early associations.

Of course the Brahmans, with their pagodas and temples, will require attention, and an inquiry into the early antecedents of the Semitic nations of that part of the world will only prove that in point of age Asia will not bear off the palm as the most ancient part of the world, in spite of the story of the Garden of Eden.

Will forward subscription for TRUTH SEEKER at as early a date as possible. Not wishing to be too prolix, I remain in the bands of brotherhood,

Yours fraternally, ED. PAYNE, M.D.

HITES COVE, CAL., Jan. 25, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:

I send you five dollars
To go round the world,
So the truth seekers' banner
Shall never be furled.
It shall wave in all countries
Beyond the blue main,
In memory of a patriot,
The illustrious Paine.

Success to you Bennett,
With health, strength, and speed,
You won't need a sword
To establish a creed.
The hornets of Canaan
Will all let you pass,
For you will not, like Balaam,
Converse with an ass.

When out in far country
Keep on the right trail,
Or you may liv like Moses,
On manna and quail.
The great wrestling angel
Will look with a frown,
Because his cathedral
You will shortly pull down.

I see that your paper
Is yet in its youth;
Nature will guide you
To seek for the truth.
You might meet a seer
Somewhere as you pass,
Like Saul, son of Kish,
When he went for his ass.

FREDRICK GARDNER.

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 30, 1881.

MY DEAR BENNETT: Count me in for $5 to the round the world fund. Yours, LEWIS BENJAMIN.

MOLINE, Jan. 30, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: Since the first offer of uniting as a sort of joint stock company to send our TRUTH SEEKER editor on a voyage of discovery around this mighty globe, I hav felt a lively interest in the plan and closely watched its progress, to hav an opportunity to become a shareholder, even at the risk of abridging some of our current expenditures in order to meet the needful outlay. As so good a number hav already taken stock, I think it is time to advance some thoughts on my mind.

Curiosity exists in relation to the Moors who conquered and ruled Spain for centuries. What is their status? And what is Carthage, that once was the rival of Rome? Great interest belongs to Egypt, the ancient seat of learning. How was it possible that such vast stores of manuscript and book-knowledge could be accumulated solely in Alexandria, and when burnt the knowledge therein contained lost, and no learned men or copies of books left? Our agent will need a great scope and use of means to grapple with pagan relics in this ancient country of despots and slaves. Will he return to us a satisfactory account or theory of the pyramids? Will he unravel the mysteries, the science, the objects, of the wonderful mummies? Are the mechanical arts and powers by which the pyramids were erected preserved, and is the knowledge of how obelisks were carved and raised still extant and known to human artisans? It seems to me like a large view to see in the mind's eye an army of stone-cutters carving an obelisk of 100 or more feet in length out of solid rock. I mistrust no stone-mason could now be found to undertake the job. Let the famous city and story of Solomon hav its proper notice with the story-book of Moses and the land of the Pharaohs. Constantinople, as the principal city and headquarters of Mohammedan bigots, should be visited; and consider why with Jerusalem it was surrendered up to heathen Infidels, and Christian and Jewish priests expelled. Shall our agent visit the land of the Medes and Persians and see their untold riches? Can he explore the British-ruled empire of India, giving reports interesting and instructiv? The celestial empire that claims greater antiquity than any other government must hav particular notice as the home of Confucius and as a beehive of humans. I would also hav Japan ventilated as affording further material for the truth seeker after a correct knowledge of the truthful arts as well as useless, pernicious ideas. On the way out or back I want information concerning the ruins so notable in Central America. For these and kindred objects I feel it a priviledge to pledge my $5.00 share of the outfit and gladly would double it if possible. Inclosed find $3.00, which place to my credit on account.

Yours truly. FRANKLIN PECK.

GALT, ONT., Feb. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Much as I dislike to take up your time let me say to you once more I thank you with all my heart for the books. Had you known me a lifetime you could not hav made a better selection. I was just in the last stages of starvation for a little common sense to read, and am just like a little child who wakes up to find that good St. Nick has filled his panties, boots, hat, and all with just what he wanted and flies from one to the other of the good things without being able to tell which pleases him most. But we are all children.

My paper arrives at 9 o'clock Saturday, is kept till Monday evening, then passed over to an inquiring mind with instructions to pass it round to any one who will read and circulate. As I told you before, I will advocate it, pay for it, and lend it to any who are not so bigoted as to burn what they cannot answer. It fills the bill.

Now, my dear sir, as you are aware, I am a mechanic and not a writer or scholar, and if I should appear rough or egotistical be sure to remember there are millions of us, and we want your works. They are pre-eminently fitted for our mental caliber and we want an Infidel around to travel to relieve us from stewed missionaries and fricasseed colporter's gush, twaddle, and books that our public libraries are filled with. I had read about war from childhood, and when I enlisted in the 2d Bat. Cav. N. Y. S. Vols., I learned something of war. I had read of the Mississippi river; when I saw the muddy stream in the Gulf of Mexico miles out from sight of land I learned of the mighty river. So you will benefit by this calm, philosophic view of the world and its inhabitants; it will add immensely to your paper. I do not share the fears of your friend, that the cause will suffer in your absence or THE TRUTH SEEKER languish. On the contrary, I believe the cause will be doubly strengthened, for thousands would read the paper for those letters who would not otherwise. I hav no fears of your executiv ability to leave the paper in hands that will foster and cherish its growth. And unless you should lose yourself altogether in "Simon's Hole" I can't for the life of me see why you can't fight on the under side as well as the upper, especially as the enemy is entrenched and fortified all around this wonderful little ball.

While I hav been writing this my wife has been reading aloud Chapman's absolute proofs of continued existence, and I now close to take up your reply to Mair's fifth letter.

I consider your imprisonment was vicarious. You suffered that we might be free. Mrs. Bennett suffered as much as you, and is as much entitled to our sympathy and kind wishes. Believe me a friend,

W. E. RENWICK.

CLEVELAND, O.

FRIEND BENNETT: Still the cry comes, "Go to Europe, India; circumnavigate the world!" We say, Stay at home, and will head an opposition subscription with five dollars. Years are fast receding with you, and we don't wish you to serve as bait for sharks. You are needed in the editorial sanctum. THE TRUTH SEEKER is improving; its tone more even, elevated. Let it become the best journal in the land—one that every cultured Liberal may be proud to read and circulate!

The lecture of George Chainey, delivered in Chicago, is apropos. May his clarion tones cease not till Charon ferries him to the "other side!"

The Hatchard-Besant debate rehabilitates past conditions—demonstrates that Nina Morais, in North American Review, has the advantage of Miss Hardaker on the "ethics of sex" question.

Allen Noe's criticisms of the "Thanksgiving Sermon," by Rev. Dr. J. A. Thayer, is timely. If all the false assumptions of the clergy in their claims as to what Christianity has done for civilization and morality were as promptly and ably refuted, much falsity would be silenced, and error and prejudice eradicated from the minds of those not accustomed to investigate, think, and reason for themselvs. The masses are accustomed to accept their mental pabulum from the lips of the priest, and public opinion has been and still is ready to brand and ostracize him who dares assert the contrary. Like the fabled dragon's teeth, may Noes, Folletts, Phelps, Goddards, Walkers, Partons, Bennetts, Wakemans, Besants, Slenkers, Severances, etc., spring forth to roll on the mighty car of progress and reform!

"Telling Experiences," by Worthy Putnam, proves him a worthy man at the post of honor and duty.

"Col. Ingersoll's Creed" is worthy the hero.

Glad to hear of Dr. Slade's mediumship again. We see no Spiritual papers of late, but we do know that those called dead still liv and at times do manifest themselvs to mortals; that they aid, guide, cheer, and direct us many times if we but see with the spiritual eye and hear with the spiritual ear.

"Truth-Seekers—Who are They?" by George Lynn, is full of choice thoughts.

Mrs. Slenker is full of good works and words; but on the sex question we differ as to some of her conclusions. Truthfulness, conformity to nature, yields harmony, happiness. A life of celibacy is unnatural. That some are gluttons is no reason that all should abstain from wholesome, nutritious food. "There are two extremes," says Buddha, "which the man who has devoted himself to the higher life ought not to follow—the habitual practice on the one hand of those things whose attractions depend upon the passions, and especially of sensuality; and the habitual practice, on the other hand, of asceticism. But the Tathagata has discovered a middle path which avoids these two extremities; a path which opens the eyes and bestows understanding; which leads to peace of mind, to the higher wisdom, to full enlightenment, to Nirvana. And this is the noble eightfold path: right views, high aims, kindly speech, upright conduct, a harmless livelihood, perseverance in well-doing, intellectual activity, and earnest thought."

We contend that the happily married are they who can the most truthfully tread this eightfold path; each sustaining, each imparting, thus mutually aiding the other.

An attempt to inculcate and establish a code of moral ethics with sexuality ignored as the highest morality would be as absurd as to seek to substitute early communal or slave marriage in lieu of that of spiritual affinity, or to accept biblical astronomy in place of the Copernican theory.

"Constructiv Liberalism," by T. B. Wakeman, is full of interest. We read it first to see what it was; must read it again to understand what it is, to digest it; must dream over it to make it a part of ourself, our thoughts.

The editorial in your issue of the 15th ult. on "Centralization of Wealth and Power" lays hold of vital interests. The centralization of wealth and power are assuming threatening proportions. Power, rightly directed, is a blessing; but who can foresee the ends to which governmental power or the powerful influence of great wealth may be directed? Individual safety requires that a balance of power be maintained. Opposing political parties should hold a balance in government. The will, the voice of the great labor-producing masses should serve as a balance to the power of wealth. There is no greater truth than that "existing evils will be corrected peaceably or by force." Oppressors and coercers must learn that eternal justice will be conserved, peaceably, if may be; by revolution if the only alternativ.

Desiring peace and blessings upon our great fraternity, love and sympathy for all that is good and pure, hopefully we labor and wait.

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

WACONDA, KAN., Feb. 1. 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: A German tells me that the way the mass of ice is gotten into the rear of the beer vaults which you mentioned in your letter from Geneva, Switzerland, is in this way: There is a strong frame of wood-work erected quite water-tight between the two apartments, and a small stream of water is admitted through the top when it is just on the point of freezing; the doors at the entrance of the cave are left open, which causes a very cold draught of air and thus freezes the water solid, when the planking is removed in the spring, exposing the ice. This may not be the fact, but it looks feasible.

If you can, please bring me half an ounce of sand from the river Jordan and a small chip from the great pyramid, and another from Balbeck. This is quite cheeky, but I hav plenty left.

Yours truly, GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

WOODBINE, KY., Jan. 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I received your paper of January 1st. Was very well pleased with what I saw of it. I read a part of the paper. There was an old hard-shell Baptist preacher at my back. He looked over my shoulder and read George Chainey on the clergy, when he became so enraged that he snatched the paper from my hands and threw it into the stove, and said that no such paper should be read in this country. I did not get the paper so as to see the subscription price. Now I want you to send me as many sample copies as you can spare. I want to distribute them among my friends. It is a new thing here. I think there are a good many citizens that will support the cause as well as myself. Giv my name to every writer of like character in the United States. Yours truly, E. FARIS.

THE REASON WHY.

MR. EDITOR: Some years ago, when the Index was published in Toledo, Ohio, I subscribed for it, and continued to read it for years. I was pleased with its professions and thought them honest. I well remember the import of editorial comments concerning a Liberal paper which was started in Canada a few years ago. In that editorial the editor of the Index complimented the Canadian publisher on the neat appearance of his paper, etc., and especially that he had declared his intention to fight the Liberal battle on general principles and evade personalities.

In this connection the reader's attention was called to the fact that the Index had never been guilty of repe ting uncomplimentary and suspicious gossip relating to clergymen, which may be so frequently seen in the public prints. The reader was expected to infer that the course of the Index was fair, honorable, and dignified; and that it would never stoop to personalities.

I had read the Index for years before I ever saw a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Finally I was requested to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I refused, because one paper of the kind was enough and I was satisfied with the Index. Finally I did subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER and I read both papers faithfully for more than one year.

"Abbot's attack on Bennett" caused me to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I wished to hear both sides. Having the utmost confidence in the Index my sympathies were with it. I read the whole controversy, and very slowly and very reluctantly was forced to the conclusion that Abbot was the aggressor, and much the more to blame. My judgment was convinced and yielded long before my inclinations yielded. My own experience, thus far, as above related was exactly the experience of my wife. The effect upon my wife and self was somewhat different. She became so disgusted with the whole matter as to consider the reading of either paper a loss of time, and has acted accordingly. I was so disgusted with the course of the Index that I discontinued my subscription to it; but hav continued an attentiv reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am now about to discontinue my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the fault I find with it is complimentary. There is too much of it. It contains too many good things. I am spending too much tim in reading it, more than I can well afford. I may ubscribe again another year, but during the present I must bend my energies in another direction.

I believe I hav paid to Jan. 1, 1881.

Please discontinue the paper on the receipt of this, and notify me of the amount of my indebtedness up to date of discontinuation.

Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER prosper, and soon may the object (equal freedom for all, regardless of opinions) for which it labors, be realized, is the ardent wish of G. E. CORBIN.

[This is about the last reason that has been adduced for discontinuing THE TRUTH SEEKER, because there is too much of it and too good. If it is a fault it is one we shall not try to correct. We shall keep on making it as full as it now is, and just as good as possible. We hope after Mr. Corbin has been deprived of it awhile he will again return to its bright, instructiv pages.—ED. T. S.]

LINESVILLE STATION, PA., Feb. 4, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Moses is busy; I hav to be his amanuensis these days. It devolves upon me this afternoon to perform the pleasant task of writing you.

We are having a good time here; find a good many Liberals who are truly worthy the name. The Paine meeting was a glorious success. The Liberal Leagues were compelled on the first day to adjourn from their own hall to a larger one, but even the Opera House could not accommodate all who wanted to attend the meeting.

Three ministers spoke from the platform, setting forth their own views in their own way. The meeting opened on Saturday, continued over Sunday and Monday night (or rather Tuesday morning), with a grand ball. The Liberals of Linesville may well congratulate themselvs upon the glorious success of their late enterprise. They hav shown to the world that they are alive and in earnest.

Moses and Mr. Jamieson concluded their debate this evening. Neither one has as yet converted the other, probably never will. "Great men will differ." Ahem!

Dear Brother, you hav many friends in this vicinity. Liberalism is marching onward. Spiritualists and Materialists are shoulder to shoulder in the movement here. This is right; we hav one common foe to meet.

Moses joins me in good wishes to you and yours. We shall work our way westward as the way opens.

Believe me, yours most truly for the cause of humanity, MATTIE E. HULL.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Jan. 31, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We keep up our little League organization here and hav regular semi-monthly meetings. I am pleased to say that we are in full accord with the National Liberal League in its movements generally, and T. B. Wakeman and T. C. Leland in particular; they fill the bill to a T.

We hav taken especial pleasure in following you to Europe and back, and would much like in the same manner to follow you around the world.

The members of the Liberal League of Utah wish to join me in kind regards to you, wishing you a long life of continued usefulness and success in your labors both financially and otherwise.

Respectfully and fraternally yours,

WALTER WALKER, Sec. L. L. of Utah.

P. S.—I ought to hav mentioned that THE TRUTH SEEKER continues to be all we could ask of it, and we much admire it in its new dress. W. W.

LIMA, MICH., Jan. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.00 for the renewal of my subscription to your paper for 1881. I wish to say I truly admire your course and spirit. You speak your conscientious convictions. The harder the blows the better. The breastwork of superstition must tremble when such broadsides as yours are brought to bear upon it. The signs of the times surely indicate that the rising generation will ignore the theological teachings and creeds of to-day. In my humble way (hemmed in on all sides). I hav been an advocate of all phases of reform for twenty-five years. My Liberal notions hav earned for me all the epithets that malice can invent to injure my moral and professional reputation. I can fully sympathize with those who by maintaining Liberal views suffer financially, and in various other ways.

Thanks to Mrs. Slenker for her good contributions in favor of her sex. I believe in the co-education of the sexes. Yours for eternal truth,

H. A. LERR, M. D.

SERANA, Jan. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We had thought of discontinuing THE TRUTH SEEKER, but your letters from Europe and the scientific part in your paper are so interesting we concluded to send for it for 1881.

As knowing ones say that the world is coming to an end in 1881, it will be well to hav the documents on hand to carry us through.

I will send you six dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881 for my neighbor. HENRY K. PARR.

WALNUT, IOWA, Jan. 1, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find money order for three dollars, which you will please credit on my subscription. Your paper, which was always good, has greatly improved both in style and matter since your return from Europe. Your leader on "The Centralization of Wealth and Power" sounds the tocsin of a political revolution. Let me second your plan of graduated taxation with all my limited influence. It would result in the gradual and equitable distribution of the vast fortunes that hav been so inhumanly wrested by legislativ injustice from the toiling millions whose labor they represent, but which hav been concentrated in the hands of a few favored drones in the human hive. If your plan be adopted the revolution, which is inevitable, will be accomplished peaceably; otherwise, sooner or later, violence and anarchy must attend its accomplishment.

Your own remarks on the question, "Is Thought Substance?" are the best that hav appeared in your paper. I hav read Spencer's "Biology," and it seems to me that his definition of life embraces thought—"the continuous adjustment of internal relations to external relations." Man is composed of physiological units—a colony of intimately-united ultimate individuals. These units, though primordially similar, hav been organized—that is, specially prepared—for their share in the division of physiological labor. Just as in a colony of people some are farmers, others millers, others blacksmiths, and others tailors, so, in the aggregate of units called man, some units co-operate as a class to accomplish something necessary to the good of the whole community. That class is called an organ, and its special work is called its function. Before these units were organized their work was not specialized, but general and crude. Primordially, each was a jack-at-all-trades, good at none. But each little unit had in itself the undeveloped and potential possibility at one and the same time of either an intellectual element of the "gray" of the brain, or as a suitable element in any other part of the body. The lowest rhizopods present no different parts, and yet they feed and grow and move about, a structureless speck of animated jelly, at once all mouth, all stomach, all skin, all limb, and all lung—a "life without organization," as Prof. Huxley observes. Does this structureless mass think? Is it not all brain just as much as it is all mouth, or skin, or stomach, or limb? Is not thought a mode of action as much as any other vital process? Is it not an adjustment of relations embraced in the biological definitions of life? We might just as reasonably erect digestion, or respiration, or any other vital process into an immortal entity. If we only enlarge the range of such speculations by analogy we can deny the fact of death at all. But you hav exhausted the subject so ably that I am ashamed of doing anything but thanking you for the paper.

I must not close without thanking Mr. Wakeman for his masterly contributions. I am anxious to hear what you may reply to Mr. Mair's last. Whatever you do, don't call names. It may be very honest and sincere to call a lie a lie, but it sounds much smoother to call it a mistake. I am quite interested with Mrs. Besant's discussion. If I am permitted to express an opinion, I think Mair is doing better than Hatchard. I wonder if Hatchard givs away books every time he holds a discussion. I never had much "brotten up." Ain't it "kinder unperlite" to be offering women books in that public way without any intentions, as one might say? Does he do it out of charity, or gallantry, or egotism, or pure cussed meanness? or don't I understand it? I guess I don't.

If you make that trip around the world won't you come and see a fellow, or will you go around the other way? You know how New Jerusalem was rebuilt. Every fellow built a little about his own house. Now, if you go around the world and come near my house I'll help you a lift on the road if it spoils a day in harvest time. J. K. P. BAKER.

THE sixth annual convention of the New England Freelove League meets in Science Hall, 712 Washington street, Boston, Mass., Sunday and Monday, Feb. 27th and 28th. Rachel Campbell, J. W. Stillman, L. A. Wiley, J. H. Swain, Mrs. Annie Bowdrie, A. P. Barnes, E. H. Heywood, and other speakers are expected.

The Modern "Code."

BY E. D. HELM, A.M., M.D.

No one so well as he who wears the boot
Can tell how much it gall or pinch the foot;
No one can know so well as he who feels
How much injustice from his honor steals,
Or filches from his hard-ear ned dues and claim,
To boost some favorit up to wealth and fame.
How often in life's struggle do we find
That modest merit comes out far behind,
While brazen impudence and selfish greed
Insure a certain prospect to succeed!

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,"
Said Mr. Shakspere, and we say again
(Men praise what others praise, or right or wrong),
Once gain the current, yon'll be pushed along,
Hav wealth and honor heaped on you beside,
Though but a shyster, so you keep the tide.
No one believes, except the honest fool,
That men grow rich who keep the golden rule,
That honest merit, or that modest worth
Are prized at half their value on this earth.

Keep what you've got, get all the rest you can—
The ruling passion and chief end of man.
Keep others back, or pull them down, if need,
From off the ladder that you may succeed.
Consult nobody's feelings but your own,
This world in chief was made for you alone:
No other's honor half so nice or dear
As is your own—an axiom very clear.
Conscience is educatable, you know,
So train it in the way you wish to go,
Nor let it giv you any great concern—
'Tis quite elastic and will serve your turn.

The unfortunate and orphan turn away,
Be generous only where you're sure 'twill pay.
Giv to the church a liberal supply
To pay through purgatory when you die.
As for the rest, laud Beecher to the skies,
Who struck out hell and left you paradise.
Amass a fortune, so that when you rot
Your name will shine without a stain or spot
Upon a gorgeous shaft of Parian stone,
Coupled with many virtues—not your own.

'Twill be a pleasant pastime for the poor
That you hav wronged or turned from out your door,
Or some unfortunate you once oppressed,
To stop and contemplate and read with zest.
Your friends will bless you that you are no more,
And soon will squander what you left in store:
Will grieve for what your splendid funeral cost
Much more than for the selfish friend they lost.
Thus endeth the "code," and my song is sung,
"Let the galled jade wince" whose withers are wrung.

Address to the Clergy.

BY WILLIAM P. ROGERS

To ye, all ye preachers, 'tis really unpleasant
To do such a duty as mine is at present—
To tell you quite freely my own honest views
And giv you your plain and self-evident dues.

Five different Bibles I've read at my leisure,
And considered them all a great family treasure,
As showing the corruption of priests and of kings,
Their lies and debauchery, and many such things.

The Protestant, Catholic, the Mohammedan Koran,
The Shaster, the new Mormon bible, and so on.
Each tells you his bible by divine inspiration
Was written by man and vouchsafed to his nation.

But as all of them differ, how plain is the odds!
Those men were inspired by five different gods;
The apocryphal testament of twenty odd books
As good as your other and as reasonable looks,

Was collected with yours when all were in writing
And given to Constantine, famed for his fighting.
He summoned a council when all were collected,
And twenty odd books by their votes were rejected.

We are sure that all honest men would deride
The idea that a council should ever decide
By their vote or their word, either comely or odd,
What books were or were not words of God.

Better, far better, yes, better you'd be,
My clerical friend, if you'd only be free.
You thresh the old straw, yes, and keep threshing on
When the grain is all out and to mill it has gone.

If you cared for your flock the price of a button
Beyond wearing their wool and eating their mutton,
You would not compel me to mournfully sing
Of the blunders and plunders of an orthodox ring.

Were you like good Job in eschewing evil,
And ceased to preach lies of your hell and your devil,
And calmly you opened your hearing and sight,
And ask of each action, My soul, is it right?

Then all the priests in this orthodox border
Would forbear e'er to plot for his pocket and order.
Come, come, ye vile clergy, the lamp may yet burn,
The vilest of priestcraft yet may return.

Now repent of your lies with a genuin grief;
Turn over a new, irreproachable leaf;
Then we'll consider you not perhaps sainted,
But yet not so black as you oft hav been painted.

Five Hundred Dollars Reward.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Hark all ye money-loving men
Who in truth's ways are wise,
A grand reward is offered for
Some honest, square replies.
Yes, certain seekers after truth,
Who error would discard,
Will giv if you will answer true
Five hundred dollars reward.

there an overruling power?
there a place called hell?
there another life for man?
We beg of you to tell.

To find the truth of all those things
We hav tried mighty hard,
But failed, and so will giv to know
Five hundred dollars reward.

Oh, who will clearly demonstrate
That clovenfoot exists?
Or that we liv beyond the grave,
And dispel all doubting mists?
All ye who know we shall not die
Hold quite a lucky card,
For for this knowledge we will giv
Five hundred dollars reward.

Oh, prove it true that there exists
A heaven of endless joy,
Where those who love the Lord will dwell
In bliss without alloy.
And oh this hell of which they tell,
Which oft our nerves has jarred,
We'll giv to know if 'tis just so
Five hundred dollars reward.

Some may reply, cash cannot buy
A proof of God above.
Then who for love of God will speak?
Yes, who will do it for love?
For love of God or zeal for truth
Who will our prayers regard,
And speak the truth for love, or take
Five hundred dollars reward?

Some noble men would scorn a bribe,
For truth alone they fight;
No love or fear of God or man
Compels them to do right;
And truth's progress no creeds or cash
Could force them to retard.
Enlighten us, ye noble men,
We'll mention no reward.

This is no hoax; we'll foot the bill
With prayers or tears or cash.
We want the truth, though heaven falls
And all things go to smash.
We are sincere, so do not fear,
And our questions disregard,
For we will giv, as sure as you liv,
Five hundred dollars reward.

Church dogmas prove; we thirst for truth,
Nor care at what expense,
But demonstrate them unto us
By rules of common sense,
And skeptics here in Belvidere,
Direct their humble bard
To tender you most joyfully
Five hundred dollars reward.

THE Standard Cure Company, No. 114 Nassau street, New York city, will send to any address a box of Emery's Standard Cure (Purely Vegetable Cream-Coated Pills), a never-failing remedy for Ague, Biliousness, and all Malarial Diseases. Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Proposition.

I am prepared and will send to any one address, direct from my office, one sheet of "Blackfoot's" Magnetized Paper, postage paid, every week for one month for forty cents; two months for seventy cents; three months for one dollar. Address, with amount inclosed, James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom st., Philadelphia, Pa.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

The mines of this company, four in number, are situated near Crosson, on the line of the Denver & South Park Railroad, and but 48 miles from Denver. This camp is considered one of the best in the state, and its easy access certainly commends it to the favorable consideration of the public. The Stonewall Mining Company is organized under the laws of Colorado, and has an authorized capital of $1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of ten dollars each, and are placed on the market for the present at two dollars per share, or a discount of eight dollars from the face value, thus enabling those who purchase at once to derive the benefit not only of dividends, but also from the advance in the price of stock, which will soon be made.

The mines of the Stonewall Mining Company are all true fissures, and as a guarantee that they are worthy of confidence, samples of ore will be sent to any one who will send ten cents to the Secretary to pay postage, or to any one visiting the office of the company samples will cheerfully be given. Write at once for prospectus.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Fallug Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely cradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extendiug the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin. containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price. $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child." "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois." "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 35 cents.

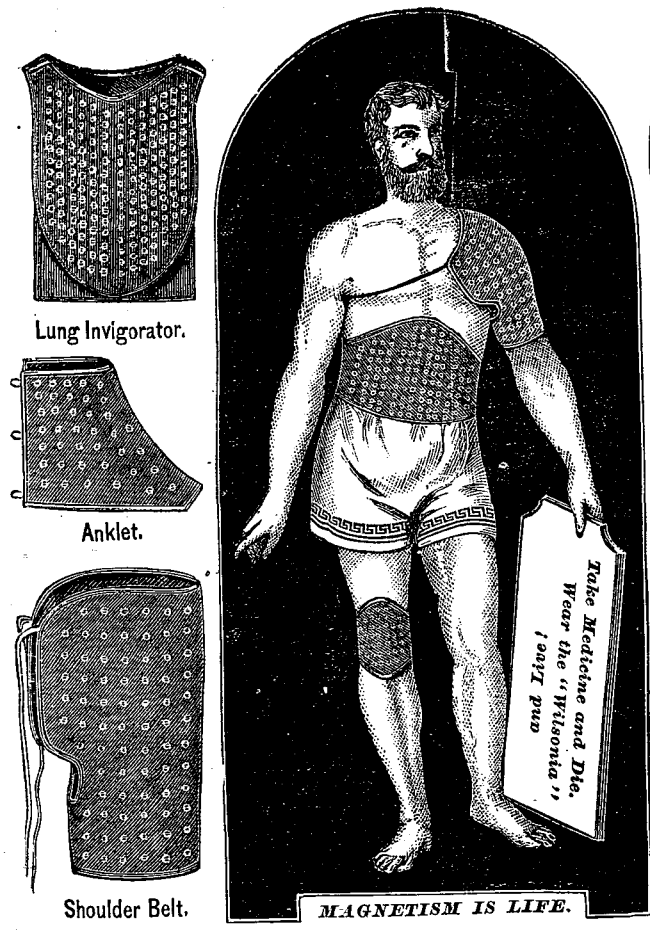
WILLIAM WILSON,



MEDICAL ELECTRICIAN,

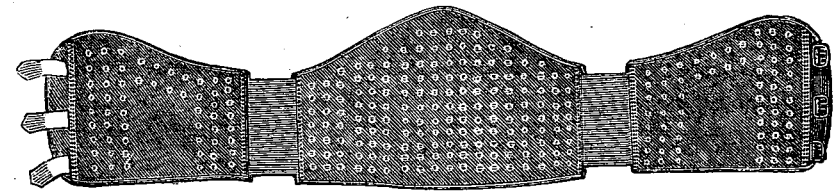
Inventor of the "WILSONIA," and Lecturer on Electrical Therapeutics, Author of "The Trial of Medicine," "The Language of Disease," Medical Fallacies," &c., &c.,

465 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN,

May be Consulted Daily from 10 A. M. to 8 P. M. Free of Charge!

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere pads or plasters which lose their efficacy in a few weeks, but are so scientifically constructed that they WILL LAST FOR TWENTY YEARS, and can be worn by different members of the same family from time to time.

Lung Invigorator.



Chest Protector.

Anklet.

Knee Cap.

Shoulder Belt.

In-Soles.

Sciatica and Lumbago Belt.

DESCRIPTION OF ABOVE GARMENTS.

Each Eylet is a galvanic cell attached to a series of powerful magnets. They are light as ordinary garments, and produce a soothing yet exhilirating effect upon the system, without causing shocks or sores, as in electric belts or galvanic chains.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are the Despair of Physicians, and the Annihilation of Quack Nostrums and Legalized Quackery. Thousands of persons are being constantly hurried on to Apoplexy and Paralysis by the use of Cephalic Snuffs and Washes. Catarrh can be readily cured without any of these nostrums.

THE "WILSONIA" CORSET AND MAGNETIC BELT

For Ladies and Gentlemen will cure Asthma, Catarrh, Loss of Energy, Nervous Debility, Bleeding at the Lungs, Kidney Disease, Tumors, Rheumatism, Gout, Paralysis, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, and every form of Female Weakness.

SEND FOR PRICE LIST Containing THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere plasters which become useless after a few weeks' wear, but they retain their curativ powers for twenty years, and can be worn by any member of the same family from time to time.

Persons who read this notice may wonder that I had not advertised my discovery before. The fact is, I determined when I arrived in America not to publicly advertise until I had five hundred patients in one city, to whom I could refer as evidence. I hav now over one thousand persons in the city of Brooklyn ready to testify that my galvano-magnetic belts will remove and cure every malady known to man, except a rotten lung, and even where the lungs hav begun to decay, my appliances will arrest the decay and heal them.

Here in the city of Brooklyn the paralyzed hav been restored; patients suffering from inflammatory rheumatism hav been taken off their crutches; nerve maladies, bearing on mania, hav been completely cured; martyrs to varicose veins, whose legs hav been bound in elastic stockings for twenty years, hav cut away their bandages, and are now as free from varicose veins as the healthiest person living; children who had never walked from birth up to three, eight, and twelve years of age, are now walking about as other children. In short, the cures effected by my appliances seem so miraculous that the above statements sound like an Arabian Night's tale. Nevertheless, these facts can all be substantiated, and my open letter to the physicians and the Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn must convince the most incredulous that my invention is the most wonderful on record.

My offer of five thousand dollars to the physicians and Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn is still open, and will continue so to be for six months.

I am prepared to go into the hospitals and will only take their incurable cases, suffering from paralysis, locomotor ataxia, inflammatory and chronic rheumatism, congestion of the kidneys, pleuro-pneumonia, or any disease their medicins hav failed to reach—less an absolutely decayed lung.

If the citizens of Brooklyn continue to suffer from any of the above maladies, they hav themselvs to blame.

The cost of my appliances, though seemingly expensiv, is one hundred times cheaper than the present method of purchasing physicians' prescriptions and paying for their drugs.

Send to me for price lists and testimonials, and make full inquiries of those who hav been cured, before you waste your time in calling upon me.

I court the fullest scrutiny, and prefer not selling you goods until you hav inquired of those who hav been cured.

To you who are suffering, and are now under the care of your physicians, prevail on them to call upon me, and acquaint themselvs with my invention before making any statements in regard to the same.

Note the address, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

Male and female assistants always in attendance from 10 o'clock, A. M., till 8 o'clock, P. M.

My appliances are being used with as marked success in England as in Brooklyn and New York.

Gems of Thought.

WELL, well! solco torto, sacco dritte—many a full sack comes from a crooked furrow; and he who will be captain of none but honest men will hav small hire to pay.—George Eliot.

LIFE'S but a day at most,
Sprung from night, in darkness lost;
Hope not sunshine every hour,
Fear not clouds will always lower. —Burns.

TO TURN away from the starry temples and petrified doctrins of supernaturalism, and read Bacon understandingly, and know Kant, and walk hand in hand with Herbert Spencer, is like coming out of some Druidical grove of sacrifice into the pure air and lightsome day for which we were made.—Waters.

THE reformer finds no enemy so bitter, no inertia so sluggish, no resistance so obstinate, as that from organized ecclesiasticism. It is the history of all reform, from the prophets stoned in Judea and the martyr crucified on Calvary, from Socrates drinking the hemlock in prison to Lovejoy murdered at Alton, that it must contend to the death with the old and traditional church.—Ednah D. Cheney.

THE Christian asks why we do not associate the Mosaic record with the stories of Munchausen and Arabian Nights as well as with Minerva and Midas. I reply that the former are simply tales, while the latter are theological facts, just as pious, holy, inspired, and credible as are the Bible facts of our era, and as many hav firmly believed in them, as history, old temples, and old inscriptions testify.—Elmina D. Slenker.

I KNOW that many regret that hard words are used against Christianity, and we regret that hard words must be used; but the hardness of the words is their truth. They would not be hard words if they were false. Truth is always hard toward error. The Sermon on the Mount was hard to the Pharisees; the emancipation proclamation was hard to the slave-holders; and so Free Religion is hard to Christianity.—L. K. Washburn.

THE good man is a priest and minister of the gods; devoted to that divinity which hath its dwelling within him; by virtue of which the man is uncontaminable by any pleasure, invulnerable to every grief, inviolable to every injury, insensible to every malice; a fighter in the noblest fight, dyed deep with justice, accepting with all his soul that which the providence of the universe appoints him. . . . He remembers also that every rational being is his kinsman, and that to care for all men is in accordance with the nature of man.—Antoninus.

THE Sermon on the Mount is generally referred to as a gem of excellence, yet it is full of flaws; not even the beatitudes stand criticism. Indeed, first of all, we hav to settle the text. Is Luke right or Matthew? Luke, instead of "Blessed are the poor in spirit," has, "Blessed are ye poor; and woe unto you that are rich, for ye hav received your consolation," which is a miserable sentiment. Also, instead of "hungering after righteousness" he makes Jesus bless those who hunger (i. e., are starving) and curse those who are full. The difference is startling and scandalous.—F. W. Newman.

IF Jesus had been, as is constantly alleged, a perfect character, he would not, in pardoning a woman guilty of adultery, hav exempted her from punishment on a false principle. The tenderness of heart that is lenient to the mistakes and faults of the unfortunate is deserving of praise, and when Jesus said to the woman, "Go thy way and sin no more," we admire his words; but when he said, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone," he enunciated a principle which, if carried out in practical life, would exempt from punishment every criminal on earth.—B. F. Underwood.

THE universality of an opinion among men who hav received a similar education does not afford any presumption in its favor; for however great the deference is which a wise man will always pay to common belief upon those subjects which hav employed the unbiased reason of mankind, he certainly owes it no respect in so far as he suspects it to be influenced by fashion or authority. Nothing can be more just than the observation of Fontenelle that "the number of those who believe in a system already established in the world does not, in the least, add to its credibility; but that the number of those who doubt it has a tendency to diminish it."—Dugald Stewart.

CHRISTIANITY is now on trial at the bar behind which it had sat as a judge a thousand years; and the judge on the bench is the scientific spirit it had so often remanded to the dungeon or consigned to the flames. The dogma is discredited in the high places of thought. Repeated modifications, definitions, restatements, made for the purpose of readjusting it to the human mind hav so far impaired its integrity, loosened its compactness, and thinned its substance, that even in its private haunts, among its most staunch friends, it is no longer what it was. . . . Millions still profess the doctrins, but millions do not; and the millions who do not are the most intelligent portion of the human race.—O. B. Frothingham.

THE recipe for making a Christian varies in different churches and in different ages. The dose of dogmas given to the patient depends upon his mental condition. A century ago infant damnation and a hell of fire were necessary to a sound Christian character, but there is not much appetite to-day for Calvinism in its pure, unadulterated form, so the doctors of theology hav modified the prescription to suit the taste of the age. There is less total depravity given than formerly, and the doctrin of election is considerably watered. The absolute deity of Jesus is not insisted on to the extent that it once was, and the inspiration of the Bible is reduced a great deal from the old standard, it being allowed that parts of the Old Testament are a little too much for the reason to swallow, while the moral sense is offended with the odor of some of its passages.—L. K. Washburn.

Odds and Ends.

A STANDING nuisance—The fellow on the curbstone.

A CRUEL husband calls his wife "green fruit," because she never agrees with him.

ONE of the best things Artemus Ward ever got off was a new sixty-dollar overcoat.

THE "envelope" muff is much worn. It stamps its wearer as ready for the next male.

A LOCOMOTIV is like a mustard plaster, because it draws, and because it is tender behind it.

THEY say Chicago girls never find it hard to elope. They make rope ladders of their shoestrings.

THEY tell us matches are made in heaven, but somehow they never smell that way when you strike 'em.

PROFESSOR.—What are the constituents of quartz? Student—Pints. A bland smile creeps over the class.

THE thrifty man will always put something away for a rainy day, even if it is nothing but a stolen umbrella.

MAIDEN lady's quotation slightly altered from an old aphorism: "Where singleness is bliss 'tis folly to be wives."

"I'M going to come down on you hard," as the rain said to the umbrella. "I'm not to be shut up in that way," was the reply.

A FANATIC is a man who thinks the whole world is a pack of fools, because they won't look through his green glasses.

HOW IS it that trees can put on a new dress without opening their trunks? Because they leave out their summer clothing.

THE man who dropped into a chair containing a tack has been uneasy ever since, and now sits down on the installment plan.

REBECCA—"Yes; a man who is continually sticking his nose into other people's business can be said to possess a roamin' nose.

THEY had women doctors in Egypt over 3,000 years ago. They used to bend over their patients, crooning, "Let me kiss him for his mummy."

"I PRESUME you understand my business," said the census-taker to the acrobat; "I merely wish to know your occupation." "O yes! I tumble," replied the acrobat.

"HOW DO you keep out of quarrels?" asked one friend of another. "Oh, easily enough," was the reply. "If a man gets angry with me, I let him hav all the quarrel to himself."

"KNOW all men by these presents," read an old bachelor lawyer. "Why don't they put women in, too?" asked his lady client. "Because," said the old b. l., "if one woman knows it all women know it."

A MARRIAGE notice begins, "John Knox has taken a wife." Well, that's nothing. It isn't near so bad as if he had taken the cholera or small-pox, or yellow fever, you know. John ain't so bad off as you think.

HARVARD student (who has just failed in a Chinese sentence, to professor)—"Thou tea-chest—" Professor (furiously)—"What! you dare to—" Student (calmly proceeds)—"Thou teaches a most difficult language."

WHEN a Michigan minister is about to elope with the wife of a parishioner he preaches a farewell sermon and exalts the duty of patience and long suffering. This sort of pours oil on the troubled waters in advance.

A SINGULAR FACT.—A Galveston gentleman has observed that when he goes out hunting and has his gun with him, and he wants to ride on the street car, he has never yet had occasion to signal a street-car driver twice.

"WHAT do you ask as a salary?" asked an American hotel keeper to a young man whom he proposed to engage to attend his bar. "Five dollars per week with the run of the bar," he replied, "or fifteen dollars without."

A YOUNGSTER while warming his hands at the fire was remonstrated with by his father, who said, "Go away from the fire—the weather is not cold." "I ain't heating the weather; I'm warming my hands," the little fellow demurely replied.

MR. JAMES BOWEN, seventy-one, and Miss Cassie Cassell, sixty-eight, were married in Washington the other day. Fifty years ago they were lovers, but the bride's parents broke up the engagement because they were too young. Father Time had removed that objection.

A SOUTH END maiden asks: "When a young man comes twice a week with a carriage and takes a young lady to the theater and a supper afterward, and makes her magnificent presents, what does it indicate?" It indicates, madam, that he has got more money to fool away than we hav.

HE softly kissed his sleeping wife,
Then with a lingering look
Of fond affection straightway went
And kissed her pretty cook.
Alas for him! the gentle wife
He thought asleep was not,
And for her cook and hubby, too,
She made it mighty hot.

IN Philadelphia two ladies met on the street, and one said to the other, "Why, you look very happy this morning; what has happened?" "Oh, I've just been up having my fortune told," was the reply, "and the woman says I'm to marry twice more, hav diamonds, and camel's hair shawl, and that I can go to the opera six times in a week if I want to." "Dear me! I don't wonder that you are happy. But you won't say anything to your husband?" "Oh, of course not. Poor man! He's good to me, and it might hurt his feelings to know that I am going to marry twice more. I think I'll tell him that I'm likely to die first."

Notes and Clippings.

OLD Sate could hav made lots of cash last week by selling chunks of heat to people; but he won't giv the people what they want in this world; he always reserves it for the next.

"DOES your father ever preach the same sermon twice that you know of?" was asked of the six-year-old daughter of a clergyman. The child replied, "I think he does; but he hollers in different places."

PASTOR MARSDEN said to his Methodist congregation, at Yarker, Ontario, that if certain members persisted in attending dancing parties they must withdraw from the church. Six persons instantly stood up and asked for dismissal.

RECENT remarks by Carlyle, as reported by the Rev. Dr. Cuyler: "I wad like to see America. Ye may talk about your Dimocracy or any other 'cracy, or any kind of poleetical rubbish, but the secret of happiness in America is that ye hav gat a vast deal of land for a very few people."

WHILE an anti-Jew war rages at Berlin, an anti-German campaign has begun at Pesth, where the authorities lately declined to permit performances in the German theater, and a paper remarks that everthing that opposes Magyar interest must be exterminated, if necessary with insect powder.

THE physiologist Leo Baltzer has lately excavated from the alluvial stratum of the Steigerthal, near Nordhausen, Germany, the skeleton of an antediluvian rhinoceros in an excellent state of preservation. The hight of the animal must hav been nearly seven feet, and its bulk nearly that of an African elephant.

GRACE GREENWOOD describes George Eliot as "exceedingly plain, with her aggressiv jaw and her evasiv blue eyes; but as she grew interested and earnest in conversation a great light flashed over or out of her face till it seemed transfigured, while the sweetness of her rare smile was something quite indescribable."

THE Chicago Sabbath Association has undertaken to enforce the Sunday law in that city. "The complaint is not so much that people work on Sunday," says the society's circular, "but that they play. It is against sinful recreation that we are moving." It is customary to open the Chicago theaters on Sunday evenings, though there is a law against it.

AT a meeting of the American Philological Society in room 36, Cooper Institute, Col. Bliss presiding, a paper was read by Dr. D. P. Holton relating to the age of the obelisk at Central Park. He deduced from the hieroglyphics inscribed upon the obelisk, and from the researches of Prof. G. Seyffarth, that the age of the obelisk is 3,762 years, and that it was completed in 1881 B.C.

THE Tribune dared to print the following: The Brooklyn clergymen are considering the propriety of a revival movement, not so much, apparently, to bring in new members as to wake up the old ones. At their meeting Mr. Pentecost said incisivly that "in the early days of the church three thousand converts were made by one sermon, and now it takes about three thousand sermons to make one convert."

PROF. GOODWIN, one of the five professors that form the Advisory Board of the Harvard College Annex, says: "The past year's experience as a teacher in the new college for women has convinced me that our plan promises more for the higher education of women than any one which has been suggested. Already in its undeveloped condition it offers young women better advantages than any institution in America offered to young men fifteen years ago.

IT may be taken as a sign of the spreading interest in geographical science that within the last ten years the number of geographical societies has more than trebled. The increase is most notable in France, which possesses twenty-three societies of this kind, or more than any other country in the world. This may be one salutary result of the last war, when it was found that the Germans knew more of the geography of France than the French themselvs.

THERE are two bishops staying at Cannes—the bishop of Gibraltar and the bishop of Jamaica. They are known there, says the London World, by the abbreviated names of "Gib" and "Jam." They are extremely popular, and are both in great request at five o'clock tea parties. By the way, that mild but fashionable form of entertainment is always spoken of by one of the fairest of the fair visitors (hailing from the other side of the Atlantic) as a "cream spree."

"DE reason what for we presented de resignation of our pastor was for de cause dat his services had become disbeneficial to de church," was the lucid statement of a colored trustee in answer to an inquiry as to the pastor's motiv for leaving. Many a white brother who has resigned his pastoral charge owing to the real or imaginary disagreement of the climate with his wife's health might just as appropriately hav summed up the case by admitting that his services had "become disbeneficial to the church."

FRANKIE HARPER has been living in Coshocton, Ohio, for months as a man without the soft shyness of the sex ever betraying that she was a woman. She even went so far as to steal some small sums of money, and in prison was not detected. She used to drive for a livery stable, and was evidently a woman's rights woman, for she voted last fall in both elections in Coshocton county. Frankie migrated to Uhricksville, and still continued to steal. This time arrest led to exposure.

THE Massachusetts Congregationalists are mourning over the fact that 200 of the 526 Congregational churches in that state went for a whole year without receiving any new members. In Illinois 483 Presbyterian churches hav less members than they had when the report was made to the Assembly of 1879, and there are 183 churches which hav received no new members. If the good that is done by the churches is to be measured by the number of persons professing conversion, it would seem as if it did not pay to keep these churches.

WILLIAM NOSTRAND, a funereal looking chap, who dropped into the prayer-meetings of the Salvation Army at the Odeon theater, in Newark, N. J., a few evenings since and exhorted sinners to repent, has been arrested for alleged fraud. He asked Joseph Niblo, one of the exhorters, for a night's lodging, and in the morning he was missing, and so were a pair of valuable gold sleeve buttons and numerous other articles. He was subsequently seen in the lower part of the city. Other charges are expected to be made by persons who had been duped by a confidence man answering to the description of the funereal worker.

OBERLIN is anything but a stagnant place. Its people hav a good many ideas—some irreverent persons might call them notions—and when they exist they are pretty sure to be ventilated. The present sensation arises from the facts that the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has been invited to lecture in the town, and that the trustees of the First Congregational church hav opened that building for his use. The Rev. George Thompson, formerly missionary to Africa, is particularly shocked at this action. He claims that many other citizens, like him, are filled with deep grief, and he protests against "the humiliation;" first, because it would wound many hearts; second, because it would be a world-wide disgrace to Oberlin, and a dishonor to God, to receive as a public lecturer one whom many hold to be a bad man. Mony believe him to be an adulterer, and in accordance with them was the late President Finney, whose pulpit he will occupy. Further, Mr. Beecher has lately renounced Christianity, and by inviting him and listening to him, a forbidden sanction is given to the man and his course. Some of Mr. Beecher's rather irreverent scripture comments are quoted in proof of this charge, and with many ejaculations of "Horrible!" "Shame!" etc., Mr. Thompson closes his appeal. Quite a number of prominent citizens hav signed the protest, it is said, and it remains to be seen whether Beecher will be warned not to appear.—Cincinnati Gazette.

THE items which compose the "table of contents" of some of the religious papers giv evidence of miscellaneous mind and versatility of talent on the part of the writers. A leading denominational organ has in its latest issue, "Poetry—Christ's Question; Princeton College; Salt Mackerel." It cannot be denied that some of these are better subjects than others for the exhibition of the poetic talents of the denominational muse. Even for a religious poet "salt mackerel" presents difficulties both in the way of versification and of the introduction of true poetic thought. The one brief word which at once suggests itself as the most appropriate rhyme for "salt mackerel" is said to hav been omitted from the newly-revised version of the scripture and the word "Hades" substituted for it.

A CLERGYMAN residing in a town near Springfield, Mass., recently preached in a Springfield church, having preached in the same church about a year ago. Through some strange forgetfulness, he had omitted to make a memorandum of what sermon he had preached on the first occasion. When, therefore, on this latter visit he announced the same text as before, and proceeded to read the same sermon, some of the brethren winked at some of the others, and there was a general wreathing of the faces of the congregation with gentle smiles. The people talked about it as they went out of church, and the talk came to the ears of the gentleman who had preached. Instead of being complimented by the fact that the people remembered what his sermon was about, he was much displeased at their taking any notice of the blunder he made.

VERY different were the policy of the first settlers of New England and their treatment of the Indians, and how little they understood the true character of William Penn and his friends may be learned by the following copy of an original letter of Cotton Mather, discovered among some old papers in the Massachusetts Historical Society. It bears date "September ye 15, 1682," and is addressed to "Ye aged and beloved John Higginson:" "There be now at sea a shippe (for our friend Elias Holdcroft of London did advise me, by the last packet, that it would sail some time in August) called ye Welcome, R. Green was master, which has about a hundred or more of ye heretics and malignants called Quakers, with W. Penn, who is at ye head of them. Ye General Court has accordingly given strict orders to Master Malichi Huxlett, of ye brig Porpoise, to waylaye ye said Welcome as near ye coast of Codd as may be, and make captivs of ye said Penn and his ungodly crew, so that ye Lord may be glorified and not mocked on ye soil of this new country with ye heathen worshipps of these people. Much spoil can be made by selling ye whole lot to Barbadoes, where slaves fetch good prices in rumme and sugar, and we shall not only do ye Lord great service by punishing ye wicked, but shall make gayne for his ministers and people. Yours, in ye bowels of Christ, COTTON MATHER." William Penn did indeed sail "in ye shippe Welcome," and a goodly number of his friends with him, but the Lord did not allow "Master Huxlett to waylaye him near ye coast of Codd and make captive ye said Penn and his ungodly crew," and the ministers and people did not receive the "great gayne" that their sale in Barbadoes for "rumme and sugar" would hav produced.

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

SECOND NIGHT.—CONCLUDED.

MRS. BESANT.

It is my duty to sum up the results of this debate so far as they appear to touch the question, to point out the arguments which my opponent has omitted to notice, and, lastly, to put before you a brief sketch of what the world was before Christianity, what the world became under Christianity, and what the world is to-day.

I must first remark that my challenge touching Strauss has remained entirely unanswered. Not only has my opponent failed to answer the argument drawn from Strauss, but he has even mistaken the very book used. He has jumped to the conclusion that I was using Strauss' best known work, the "Leben Jesu," although I twice gave the title of the book really used. In the quotation read, Strauss points out the utter disagreement between the Mosaic account of the creation and the facts known to science. But my opponent says that Strauss is not now read in Germany. Well, the book is in its sixth edition, and that is pretty good for an unread man. My reason for using Strauss will hav been very obvious to you. My opponent, in a way which was scarcely courteous either to the audience or to myself, sneered at us as ignorant of German, and said that he could hav overpowered us with German authority, but did not, as we should know nothing about them. So I thought I would test his own knowledge of German, and I am inclined to think that the result is hardly satisfactory.

Now for the missionaries and their work. Major-General Stuart, in a book I hav here, implores the government to stop them on the ground that they are undermining our rule in India and are rendering revolt probable. As to their moral influence, listen to the words put into the mouth of a Hindoo by Abbe Dubois: "You speak of morality, and of purity of manners, and you boast of a great superiority over me in these respects. But, pray, how comes it that from the very accounts you are not ashamed to publish even in this, my supposed thoroughly corrupted country, it appears that in each of your respectiv metropolises, London and Paris, you reckon no less than forty thousand prostitutes? . . . You speak in high terms of your civilization, of your refined education and manners, but how comes it that amidst the advantages you claim over me in these respects, crimes and vices of every kind are more prevalent in your countries than in mine? From whence comes it that, with the superior education and civilization you boast of, your cities and towns are filled with thieves, sharpers, pickpockets, swindlers, gamblers, forgers, false coiners, and other knaves of every description, most of them happily unknown in my supposed thoroughly corrupted country?"

But we are told Dr. Owen and Dr. Carpenter are Christians. I do not know if Dr. Owen be a Christian. If so, it may explain his taking the wrong side on evolution. But Dr. Carpenter no more believes in the deity of Christ than I do. He is a Unitarian, and it is not fair to bring forward in defense of orthodoxy a man who is three parts a heretic.

Mr. Hatchard admits that Christianity brought forward no new intellectual truths, and he has not denied—indeed, he could not—the ignorance that reigned while Christianity was supreme; so my first proposition stands. Christianity took hundreds of years before it tried to abolish slavery. Mr. Hatchard asserted that it abolished it in the Southern tates of America. I gave three important authorities in contradiction, and though Mr. Hatchard has spoken twice since he has not given one authority in support of his statement, so that, as regards slavery, you hav Mr. Hatchard's bare assertion on one side and all the facts on the other.

The persecution on the part of the churches is admitted; in the face of history it could not be denied. Has not the influence on the world tended to horrible persecution? But we are told that Christianity was practically dead during the middle ages, and revived at the Reformation, when Christianity and learning came back together. But if so, Christianity died when it was wanted and came back when it was superflous. But, says Mr. Hatchard, the human race was educated like a child. Is that so? Are the laws of Moses fit for a child to follow, or even to read? Are these cruel, persecuting, bloodthirsty laws the laws by which God educated his creature man? Why, the worst father or mother among you would not train their children as God is said to hav trained his.

Friends, I urge to you that Mr. Hatchard has utterly failed to prove his own position and that he has left my points absolutely unshaken. The only place wherein he even tried to show that Christianity has been useful was in India, and here he did not touch the terrible evidence I gave you on the other side. So much for the debate. Now for a general view of the influence of Christianity on the world. Carry back your minds to the old days, long, long before the birth of Christ. Come with me to India, and see the wise men studying astronomy, mapping the heavens, recording the motions of the stars. Come to Egypt, and see the learned there gazing at the starry worlds around them, climbing to a knowledge which Christendom afterward destroyed. Come from the East, come from India, and from Egypt, into Europe, and stay awhile in Greece. Remember Greece in the days of paganism, in the days of her glory! Vicious? Aye, but Christendom had the vices, but where had it the magnificent intellect which Greece and Rome gave to the world? [Cheers.] I would ask you now, friends, not to cheer me, for I hav much to say and brief time for speech. Wait in Greece and look around you. See the canvas glow under the pencil of Apelles. See the marble grow to life under the chisel of Phidias. Art was beautiful, and lent her grace to life, and hand in hand with Art went Science, her sister. Philosophy rose in the writings of Democritus and Epicurus. The golden groves of Athens were musical with the voice of Socrates, with the teachings of Plato; mathematics found such mastery in Euclid that you send your children to school to-day at the feet of the old pagan. Greece gave birth to the drama. Tragedy rose to her most majestic expression, comedy found the mirthfulest utterance, for art was there as many-sided as nature. And the sterner sciences had too their place; physical science was cultivated, nature was questioned, natural philosophy was built up. And all this without Christianity. Science grew, and life was beautiful. The very idolatry had its beauty, for it worshiped the natural. But Christianity was born, and instead of the glow and the glory of paganism, the "world grew gray at the breath" of the Galilean. Pass from Greece to Rome. Cicero is to-day the model of the purest eloquence. Statesmen go to school to these old teachers, who were pagan and not Christian in their thought, and learn from them stately eloquence with which they used to sway the nations. Such were the might, the glory, and the beauty of pagan Greece and Rome.

And now Christianity is born—born in Judea among an ignorant and a barbarous people. Christ comes with words of love on his lips and a destroying sword in his hand. See the cross is in the hand of his servant the church, and she goes among the poor, and her influence spreads until she climbs the throne of the Cæsars. And now she bears the crucifix in one hand and the sword in the other, and she reigns from the imperial throne. The crucifix is her symbol, and look at it well. A dead man hangs on the cross, turning men's thoughts to death instead of to life. See from his riven side flow water and blood; water for the tears that shall be shed for his sake; blood for the lives that shall be spilled in his name. See how she walks over Europe, the cross in her hand. The land is as the Garden of Eden before her, but behind her a desolate wilderness. The arts decay; the schools disappear; all knowledge is withered at the breath of the church. Intellectual death everywhere meets our eyes. Gloom and darkness envelop Christendom—darkness only lightened up by the lurid flames from the stake where the heretic is burning, and yet more lurid flame of the hell beyond the grave.

But see, there is a gleam of light breaking through the blackness of the sky! It comes from Spain, where the followers of the false prophet are. Science is born, new-born to bless the earth. But round the cradle of the infant Hercules gather the serpents of the church. They hiss and bite and struggle; their fangs are the dungeon and the stake, and the child is in sore peril of life; but he fights and catches the hydra necks and strangles them, and the serpents no longer can bite. Yet the struggle is not over; it continues even till to-day. The crucifix is stricken to the earth; the sword is broken and dashed from the hands of the church. It can no longer touch the body; it can only cramp the soul.

But we will free the souls of men as we hav freed their bodies. Instead of religion we will giv them science. Instead of heaven we will giv them earth. Instead of credulity we will giv them knowledge. Instead of fear we will giv them love—love on the earth which Christianity has darkened instead of fear of the hell which the churches hav dreamed. We raise a nobler temple and we bring a grander creed. Our morality is based on experience, not on revelation; on man's needs, not on God's command. Thus at length shall the world regain its old beauty, and it shall be beautiful, because it shall be consecrated to man, and shall no longer be darkened, because it belongs to God.

Mrs. Besant resumed her seat amid tremendous applause, accompanied by the waving of hats and handkerchiefs and shouts of "Bravo!" which continued for some minutes.

When silence was at length restored, the Rev. A. Hatchard rose and said: I trust you will hav the courtesy of Englishmen on my motion to accord to Mr. Bradlaugh a hearty vote of thanks for his taking the chair here to-night. It is the first time I hav been present on this platform before you, but I trust it will not be the last. I sincerely hope that Mrs. Besant and myself will meet again under similar circumstances in the early part of the coming year. There are one or two points to which I should like to refer.

The Chairman here rose and intimated that this could not be allowed.

Mr. Hatchard (to the Chairman): May I just say one word respecting Strauss?

The Chairman: I say that I must stop anything but the mere motion.

Mr. Hatchard then moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman, which was seconded and put by Mrs. Besant, and carried unanimously with loud applause.

The Chairman briefly responded, thanking the audience for the attention paid on both nights, and declared the meeting closed.

Is Mind Material?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I notice in my article on "Is Mind Material?" published in your issue of January 15th, toward the close, that the little word is placed after the word mind makes the positiv assertion that mind is the result of the organizations and forces that it controls, which is a direct contradiction of my second proposition, and which is if placed before the word mind would modestly ask the question, Is mind the result of the organizations and forces that it controls? as I intended to say.

And now, to further illustrate my idea of the independence of mind over and of the material organizations, let us commence with some of the lower grades of life manifestations as seen in vegetables, insects, etc. We see the plant grow up from a germ, at first a sprout, then develop buds, stems, and leaves, and manifest a kind of life that we call vegetable life, and in some kinds we can see what would almost seem to be intelligent life, as in the sensitiv plant that will recede from your touch, and the running vine in its climbings and the reaching forth of its tendrils, which seem to feel their way around obstructions in order to find the most convenient and secure place to fasten on in order to hold the body of the vine in its place and secure it from the injury it would be exposed to without that support. It seems to be working to save its own life just as much as the fox or hare in fleeing from the pursuit of the hound at its heels.

Now in looking at that manifestation of life it does not appear to me as if the peculiar organization of that vegetable were the cause of that manifestation of life; but on the contrary, as if what life there is were the cause of that growth of plant and vine, and that the material organization is merely the medium through which that manifestation is or could be made to our senses and through our organs of sense to our own minds. Of insects, the honey-bee and the spider furnish examples that serve to illustrate the nature of insect life, and in those two cases we can see what is called instinct by the philosophers of this world, but it is an instinct that produces results that equal in some respects anything the human mind is capable of. The shape of the honey cells, six-square, just the shape exactly to fit together and occupy all the space and no waste room, as perfectly as a square or triangle would do, and at the same time the nearest to a circle possible and accomplish the object, appears to be the result of intelligence and of a mathematical calculation; and all the rest of the bees' work in the manufacture and storage of the products of their labor, the honey, may well put to the blush the boasted intelligence of very many of the human species who consider themselvs the head and front of all the intelligence in the universe. And the work of the spider in spinning his silken thread on which he will suspend himself, apparently in mid-air, and the unaccountable intelligence manifested in managing to carry that slender thread from one point to another, yards apart, and elevated perhaps as high as the tops of buildings, with no possible connection between them higher than the surface of the earth, challenges the admiration and skill of the proudest intellectual genius the human species can boast of; and the sagacity shown in the selection of the place to build his web where it would be the most likely to entrap the victim it is designed for, and the manner of weaving and form of the web, all point in the same way, indicating a degree of intelligence, as far as it goes for that particular purpose, equal to anything the human mind can boast of. I can see in those examples how the principle of life can be manifested through these peculiar organizations, and that is all.

Of the organizations I know nothing, only as I can judge of their organizations by the results, as I do of every cause and effect. And also with the lower orders of animal life we see manifested what is evidently intelligence in a certain sense. I hav seen horses that I thought knew more than their drivers, and dogs that seemed to know more than their masters. But that does not prove to my mind that it is the peculiar material organization of their brain that is the cause of that intelligence, because I see that intelligence manifested through that organism, but that such exhibition of intelligence could not be made without that organization.

And with ourselvs, the principle seems to me to be applicable. We could never know what our fellow-beings were thinking about unless we could know what they were doing or had been doing, and it is upon that principle alone that we in our courts of justice and everywhere else decide upon the character of every person within the circle of our acquaintance. We are in our material organizations simply mediums through which, by means of our organs of sense and the power of speech, we can manifest ourselvs to our fellow-beings and every other intelligence within the reach of that manifestation.

Judging from cause and effect, it appears just as reasonable, and more reasonable, to suppose that the material organization is the result of some mind power than that the mind is the result of material organization, for as far as I can see, the mind is the power that controls every organ of sense, the organs of speech, and every organ and faculty for the proper exercise of which I am responsible. The heart will continue to beat without the direct action of my mind, but if I hav a will to do so I can put a stop to its pulsations in a very short space of time, and I hav no more doubt that my heart is pulsating under the direction and control of an unseen intelligence, an eternal mind, though in perfect accordance with law, the law of nature, which law is only an expression of the will of that mind of that intelligence, than I hav of my own existence. My God is not a God of condition, nor my mind, source, and power a vast reservoir in ethereal space of an element from which peculiar organisms draw just the quantities regardless of quality that are necessary for their present needs, which theory would also imply the necessity of a mind, an intelligence, to start with in order to perform the operation.

In regard to the senses, the mind has perfect control of them. The eye answers the purpose of a telescope, or a microscope, to present objects to the mind. It is a lens by means of which material objects are reflected upon its retina, and by some means, as incomprehensible as my own existence or that of the universe, is conveyed to my mind, and I see it. I know that I see it, or else I can know nothing. That object is imprinted upon the retina of my eye on the same principle, in the same way, that an object is imprinted upon the object-glass in the camera of the photographer, and photographed in my mind, and when that is done I can shut my eyes and see that object a thousand times if I wish to do so, just as distinctly as I saw it at first. Besides, the eye is under the control of myself just as much as the telescope is under the control of the astronomer. I can direct it to look where I please and to do as I please. It is an instrument that I use to accomplish what it was made for, what it was designed for. The eye shows design as much as the telescope. It tells as plain as nature can tell anything that it was made to see with for my use.

But the eye itself sees nothing any more than the camera sees. I hav seen a statement somewhere not long since that where there was sufficient light the image or likeness of a murderer might be reflected upon the retina of the victim's eye and remain there after death, and by that means the murderer could be detected.

But the eye would see nothing. The mind had left, but the organization of the eye would remain just as perfect as ever until dissolution began to destroy that organ. And the sense of hearing is under the control of the mind as well as the eyes. There may be hundreds of sounds ringing in my ears, and while my mind is directed intently upon one particular sound, unless the others are so loud as to drown the one I wish to hear, I will scarcely notice them. And if it is really necessary to prevent sounds from troubling me, I can stop up my ears, and all the organs of sense are under the control of and subject to the mind.

And the evidence seems to be just as clear that the brain is subject to the mind, as well as these other organs.

We know that continuous hard thinking tires the brain, and that it needs and must hav rest at times in order to be able to stand the strain put upon it. And yet the mind has the control of the whole matter. I can stop that intense thinking and let the brain rest or not, just as I please, and the brain seems to hav nothing to do about it only to submit to my will. And again, I can think of anything I hav a mind to, and the brain must perform my will, whether it would or not, if it can.

I could go on with arguments almost indefinitly in support of this proposition that the mind is independent of and not the result of material organization, and may in another article hereafter giv some more illustrations of my views on the subject. But I do not wish to take any more space in your columns than I consider really necessary to present my thoughts in as condensed a form as I can and giv a clear expression of my ideas to the understanding of those who may take the time to read these lines.

The mind appears to be enthroned supreme over and independent of this material organization for its existence, with power to govern and control the whole concern; and according to the law of cause and effect, cannot be the result of the organizations and forces that are subject to its control.

Another Friend's Views on Mind, etc.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I hav been much edified of late by the perusal of sundry articles in your paper by various persons on the subjects of thought, mind, spirit, body, etc. Much interest has been elicited from most or all of you. I am an unlearned man, but with your leave will giv a brief statement of my views.

Man's embryotic state is anterior to the fetal, properly speaking. About that state I'll say nothing here. But during this state we grow, formulate, and mature, after which we are ushered into the outer air, which we instantly inhale. This inhalation is the change from the fetal to the air life. This change quickens sensation into action, and we feel pain and cry. Next, in quick succession, we are able to hear, see, taste, and smell. Sensation is fully developed, and it, in turn, quickens thought into action. The multiplicity of thoughts constitutes mind. Mind, in time, contains many parts, as will, reason, memory, etc. Moreover, mind grows, changes, modifies, and qualifies from this till the air life terminates. Does the mind then die too? This question, I admit, I am not able to answer. But this I do think: if any part or portion of man livs after death in a conscious state, it is his mind. I know not whether man possesses a spirit or a soul, but I do know he has mind; and some men and women hav minds very highly endowed by nature. The existence of this I believe to be sumultaneous with that of the body. But I must allow this to be conjecture. I promised brevity.

My own mind concludes that man is made, changed, and formulated up to what we find him by and through his own mind alone. This is not hard to conceive when we follow up the differentiation theory of modern scientists. Take, for illustration, the common hog with a snout and other requisits for rooting the ground for his food, together with his scavenger-like proclivities, and then of a sudden or gradually withdraw all the food he now subsists on from the places he has been wont to find it, and let it afterward be found growing on low vines and herbage, just above his ordinary reach, and let it thus continue to grow year after year, a little higher every succeeding year, use and adaptation would enable him to stretch and elongate his body and snout to equal the necessary requisit to enable him to obtain his food. But at length nature might tire of this mode of feeding, and, as a substitute, through use his hoofed fore feet would change to fanged feet, better enabling him to take his food; and in time, too, he would acquire the use of his hind feet to stand and raise himself on, thus qualifying himself for the task of procuring his ever-receding food.

Yet another change is gradually taking place in the vegetable kingdom. Bush food is diminishing and low tree food increasing. Our animal now sees tempting fruits growing on the boughs of low, large-bodied trees, yet just beyond his reach. He does without it the first few years, and grows lean and lank. The ripened tree fruit falls plentifully to the ground, but his long snout and half-bear appearance hinder him from getting at it to good advantage. At length the sense of taste forces an idea through his mind. He resolvs to try to help himself to get up the tree, goes and makes an unsuccessful effort, and then another, and thus repeats them till he succeeds. He climbs or walks around in such a bungling way that he falls a good many times to the ground, but, the tree being low, escapes nearly unhurt. It is not long before he finds himslf a ready climber, and soon finds his plight changing for the better. In course of time he migrates to other unknown parts in quest of other food and other haunts.

After an incomputable number of years we find him metamorphosing into a gorilla or some "missing link," then again into some variety of ape, and finally into man, where he must needs remain a long time yet. The world contains human beings to-day that are but few removes above some of the higher order of animals. And man unquestionably retains some of the traits of character of many of the lower animals—a proof of how far the law of inheritance will extend.

And through all these successiv changes every animal has been seemingly forced to possess a mind instructing him how to procure his living and enjoy life; and these minds cause their bodies to be shaped and grow in the best manner possible to enable them to procure their living. Hence the mind is the product of sensation cast in nature's mold, and cannot and (it seems to me) need not survive the body. Yet I cheerfully admit the mind may hav capacities and potencies that may yet, and even now do, display themselvs in ways and modes not by us comprehended. And this may yet be the metaphorical sphinx to unravel Spiritualism.

The Terrible Railroad Disaster.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

The following communication appeared in the Elmira Daily Advertiser. It may be of some interest to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. H. L. G.

I hav just finished reading the very full account, published in last Monday's edition of your paper, of the terrible disaster that took place on the Erie Railway on Saturday night. It makes one's blood run cold to contemplate the terrible suffering of poor Brewer and his postal-car associates; and I do not wonder that your reporter, who is probably a Christian gentleman, says, "When we think of the tragedy, rebellious thoughts are apt to rise against the destiny that so shaped the ending of their lives, and the utmost faith in Providence is necessary to reconcile the mind to the wisdom of the All-Wise in so sadly terminating such valuable manhood." And it is impossible to reconcile such a dark tragedy with the belief that a God of infinit power and infinit love rules the universe. It can't be done.

The doctrin of the Christian church is that God is a being of love. Their Bible declares that "God is love." This church holds that he can do whatever he pleases, and that he is everywhere present, or at least takes cognizance of all that transpires. Now if this theory is true, God knew when this postal-car rolled down the bank that there was no power that could save these suffering men but his infinit power, and still he did not "reach forth his hand and save them." He had the power to save them, and if he is a humane being he must hav had the desire. Then why did he not rescue them from the flames? I submit that question to my Christian friends for their consideration. There is not a human being on the face of the globe so lost to the dictates of humanity that he would not have torn open the burning car and dragged forth the victims if he had had the power to do so.

There is only one solution to this question, and many of the best minds of the nineteenth century hav adopted it. That solution is, "There is no such God in existence."

In the old days man believed in the existence of this orthodox God more implicitly than he does to-day, and he then relied with more faith upon his protection. And while that faith lasted he made but little exertion to protect himself from accidents, famin, or disease. But as he lost faith in this imaginary God he gained faith in himself, and learned if man is to be saved anywhere he must save himself. And in the good time coming we will all learn the important truth that there is no higher savior known to humanity than man. Brave men made an unsuccessful attempt to save these poor postal clerks from the devouring flames, but the fabled orthodox God failed to put in an appearance at the time and place that required his almighty aid if it was ever required anywhere.

Then there is another thought suggested by this great calamity in relation to orthodox theology that I desire to mention. Possibly some or all of these men who were burned to death were not Christians. If so, according to orthodox Christianity, they went from a burning car into an eternal burning hell, there to groan in agony throughout eternity.

The whole country is shocked by the terrible tragedy that took place at Tioga Center. That lasted but for an hour, yet the whole civilized world has contemplated for hundreds of years, with seeming indifference, an orthodox creed that consigns 99 out of every 100 to the pains of eternal fire. And we are told that in the future world the good (?) people of earth will be happy while viewing the great car called hell on fire forever, in which will be imprisoned millions of human beings, among whom will be our friends, fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, and children. That creed is not true. It is the most wicked lie that man ever uttered, and I am thankful that a nobler humanity is fast rooting it out of the opinions of the world.

Giv the Mediums a Show.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

On Dec. 22, 1880, a Boston medium wrote to a Western correspondent the following predictions, which were a digression from the subject matter of the letter. The great calamity near at hand was fulfilled in a fearful railroad disaster in January, and in fact by several severe disasters of one kind or another. It may be well to place the prediction on record regarding financial matters to certain individuals, which does not, however, infer a general financial panic or crash. The year has surely started in with more than the ordinary number of calamities and fires in cities.

Yours, WATCHER.

Wisconsin, Feb. 9, 1881.

PREDICTIONS.

"1881 will be a year long to be remembered in financial circles. Many serious things will occur during the year. Fires in large cities, accidents, and loss of life on land and sea. (A great calamity is now near at hand.) There will be some of the heaviest failures ever known. Many who feel secure will fall, and many who are almost in poverty will become immensely rich."

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

IV.—The Fall.

TEXT: And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden; but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die; for God doth know that on the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.—Genesis iii, 3-5.

There are few religions, if indeed there are any, which do not hav at least one God and one devil—a good spirit and a bad. Judaism was no exception, and from Judaism Christianity derives its God, the maker of all things, and Satan, who introduced sin into the world.

Satan is supposed to hav been embodied in the serpent of the text, and in that form to hav tempted Eve. In this incident we find the origin of one of the fundamental doctrins of Christianity. The fall of man from a state of perfection into the abyss of sin was the penalty of disobedience.

How a state of perfection can be consistent with even one act of disobedience, with the slightest deviation from rectitude, we do not pretend to say. We hav, however, the assurance of theologians, who ought to understand their business, that Adam and Eve were in a state of perfection when they committed the first sin.

Long before Eve was created, according to the rib tradition, but in the second week of her existence, according to the story told in the first chapter of Genesis, God placed Adam in the Garden of Eden, giving him leave to eat of every tree of the garden except the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. He was solemnly warned not to eat of that, for in the day that he should, so said the Jewish God, he would surely die. This, however, was only an idle threat, as the event proved. For some one of the inscrutable reasons which hav prompted God to do innumerable absurd things since the world began, he did not desire that the noblest work of his creation—man—should distinguish between good and evil. Whether it was his desire that man should enjoy both without a knowledge of the difference, or whether he foresaw that with the knowledge of evil would come a propensity to evil, is not made clear. Certain it is that the Lord was very anxious that man should not hav a knowledge of good and evil. Therefore he denounced the most extreme penalty he could conceive against that which would enlighten Adam upon the subject. He threatened him with instant death. "For in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," was his language.

But the serpent, the most subtle beast of the field which God had made, a shrewd, sharp, cunning fellow, but well-disposed withal, turned the matter over in his mind, and correctly concluded that a knowledge of good and evil would not kill at sight. He either fathomed the divine purpose and learned that it was not God's intention to impose death as the penalty for disobedience, or else he knew that the God of the Jews did not possess power over life and death. What theory he acted upon cannot be definitly determined now; it is, perhaps, enough to know that whatever theory it was, it led to a sound conclusion.

Knowing, therefore, that death would not follow disobedience, and being of a radical disposition, firm in the belief that a diffusion of knowledge is good and not evil, for which belief, like the faithful radical he was, he was willing to measure swords with all the powers of the universe, he cast about for an opportunity to notify man that the threat of death for eating of the tree of knowledge was only intended to intimidate, and that he would not surely die.

But Adam was a stupid conservativ, than which nothing is more repulsiv to a well-regulated radical, and the wily serpent avoided him to seek an audience with Eve. He told his story in a plain, straightforward way, which carried conviction. He assured her that God well knew that in the day she and Adam should eat of the tree their eyes would be opened and they would be as God himself, knowing good and evil.

The fruit was eaten by Eve, who gave her husband a part, and he ate also. The result verified the serpent's prediction. Neither of them died on that day or the next. They lived to a ripe old age. It was not until hundreds of years after this event that they passed away.

And their eyes were opened, just as the serpent had assured Eve—they knew good from evil.

The immediate result of this knowledge was a sense of shame at their nakedness, so intense that when the Lord came down into the garden in the cool of the day, and was sauntering about, probably wondering what this zoological and horticultural establishment of his amounted to after all, Adam and Eve hid themselvs among the trees.

For an omniscient being the Almighty displayed a sad ignorance of the momentous event that had occurred in the garden while he was attending to business elsewhere. His eyesight, too, was so defectiv that he had to call out to Adam before he knew where he was.

When a searching investigation had brought the facts to his knowledge, Adam, with the cowardice which has characterized conservativs in all times, threw all the blame upon the poor woman. She in turn threw it upon the serpent. But he proved himself a worthy patron-saint of radicalism; for though his punishment was greater than the others, he made no complaint nor any effort to shirk responsibility.

Here is the story which our children are taught to believe as a true revelation of the introduction of sin into the world. The supreme architect of the universe is pictured as a mortal with limited vision, limited knowledge, and limited power. He approaches man with a lying threat upon his lips, and punishes one of the beasts of the field for exposing his deceit.

The story is such as might be expected to grow from the imagination of a poetic barbarian. There was good and evil in the world, for the origin of which it seemed necessary to account; hence God, the serpent, the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the temptation, and the fall. As an allegory it has a crude beauty. But as history it is refuted by common sense and by the observation of the growth of the knowledge of good and evil in the mind of a child which from absolute moral perfection, the equivalent of intellectual darkness, develops with the child's growth into a mixed condition of good and evil colored and influenced by the moral state of the society in which it develops. The acquisition of knowledge of right and wrong is a natural intellectual process stimulated and guided by education and association. The story of which our text forms a part roughly sketches the process in the form of allegory; but there is no more rational excuse or justification for declaring the incident to be an actual fact than there would be for accepting Homer's Iliad as a divine revelation. In truth, each of these is a poetic record of national superstition—one, that of the Greeks and Romans; the other, that of the Jews.

As a history of ancient Jewish tradition the story of the fall is valuable precisely as all mythologic stories are. It is through these traditions that we read the thoughts of people long since passed away. But as a history or revelation of the origin of evil in the human race it is worthless.

Even the church is coming to regard the narrativ as allegorical; but it has not yet proceeded so far as to divest it of the divine atmosphere in which it has floated for so many centuries.

It is still the authority for that church doctrin without which the doctrin of the atonement would fall to the ground, and with it the divinity of Jesus of Nazareth. Christianity requires implicit belief in the fall of man from a state of perfection to a condition of sin by an act of disobedience. By this act all men are lost. But as no man wants to be lost, and the devotees of Christianity are each especially solicitous to make his own calling and election sure, the doctrin of the atonement is brought into play, whereby the elect who are lost in Adam's fall may be redeemed through the mediation of Christ Jesus, who came among men to save sinners, and gave up the mortal life he had assumed as a vicarious atonement for the sin which Adam's disobedience introduced into the world.

The credulity of modern Christians will be a more prolific subject for wonder and ridicule as the world advances than is now that of the Romans, whose warlike operations were guided and determined by the entrails of a fowl.

THE Republican, of London, England, speaks of us in the following kind and complimentary manner: "THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, comes forth resplendent in a new dress of type, and with a fresh heading. The familiar, if somewhat involved, illustrated title, representing Benj. Franklin in a chemist's shop, has given way for a tasteful and effectiv engraved heading, in which the title of the paper alone appears. Friend Bennett is a jovial and efficient editor, and the epistles which he occasionally prints from his readers shows that his efforts are heartily appreciated. The letters that he wrote for his paper describing his tour in Europe hav highly pleased the Freethinkers of America, and they (the letters, not the Freethinkers) are to be published in a volume, to be entitled, 'An Infidel Abroad.' The book will be a novelty, and will doubtless hav a good sale. We shall hav something to say on its appearance."

Alamontada.

With this issue we commence the publication of an excellent romance from the German, translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Mr. Ira G. Mosher. The story possesses thrilling interest, is extremely well written, and very radical in character. Almontada was a galley-slave, but an unbeliever in the dogmas of the church. His replies and arguments will be found to be of a deep and thoughtful character. It is a good time with the commencement of the story, for new subscribers to begin. It will itself repay the reader the subscription price of the paper. How many new readers will begin with the story of Alamontada? It will be issued in book form after it appears in these columns.

Miscellaneous.

Ingersoll Interviewed.

Col. Ingersoll has been interviewed on the interesting topic of Delaware and the charge of Judge Comegys of that state to his grand jury in reference to the distinguished pagan's late public expressions of Infidelity while within the limits and confines of that state.

"Hav you read Judge Comegys' compliments to you?" asked the reporter.

"Yes, I hav seen his charge, in which he relies upon the law passed in 1740. Afer reading his charge it seemed to me as though he had died about the date of the law, had risen from the dead, and gone right on where he left off. I presume he is a good man, but, compared with other men, something like his state when compared with other states. A great many people will probably regard the charge of Judge Comegys as unchristian, but I do not. I consider that the law of Delaware is in exact accord with the Bible, and that the pillory, the whipping-post, and the suppression of free speech are the natural fruit of the Old and New Testaments. Delaware is right. Christianity cannot succeed, cannot exist, without the protection of law. Take from orthodox Christianity the protection of law, and all church property would be taxed like other property. In the state of Delaware, if Alexander von Humboldt were living, he could not be a witness, although he had more brains than the state of Delaware has ever produced, or is likely to produce as long as the laws of 1740 remain in force. Such men as Huxley, Tyndall, and Haeckel could be fined and imprisoned in the state of Delaware, and, in fact, in many states in this Union. Christianity, in order to defend itself, puts the brand of infamy on the brow of honesty. Christianity marks with a letter "C," standing for "convict," every brain that is great enough to discover the frauds. I hav no doubt but that Judge Comegys is a good and sincere Christian. I know nothing of his character except as I gather it from this charge, and after reading the charge I am forced simply to say Judge Comegys is a Christian. It seems, however, that the grand jury dared to take no action, notwithstanding they had been counseled to do so by the judge. Although the judge had quoted to them the words of George I., of blessed memory; although he had quoted to them the words of Lord Mansfield, who became a judge simply because of his hatred of the English colonists, simply because he despised liberty in the new world; notwithstanding the fact that I could hav been punished with insult, with imprisonment, and with stripes, and with every form of degradation; notwithstanding that only a few years ago I could hav been branded upon the forehead, bored through the tongue, maimed, and disfigured, still, such has been the advance, even in the state of Delaware, owing, it may be, in great part to the one lecture delivered by me, the grand jury absolutely refused to indict me. The grand jury satisfied themselvs and their consciences simply by making a report in which they declared that my lecture had 'no parallel in the habits of respectable vagabondism;' that I was 'an arch-blasphemer and reviler of God and religion,' and recommended that should I ever attempt to lecture again I should be taught 'that in Delaware blasphemy is a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment.' I must admit that for Christians the report is exceedingly mild and gentle. I hav now in the house letters that passed between certain bishops in the fifteenth century, in which they discussed the propriety of cutting out the tongues of heretics before they were burned. Some of the bishops were in favor of and some against it. One argument for cutting out their tongues, which seemed to hav settled the question, was that unless the tongues of heretic were cut out they might scandalize the gentlemen who were burning them by blasphemous remarks during the fire. I would commend these letters to Judge Comegys and the members of the grand jury.

"If Christianity is right Delaware is right. If God will damn anybody forever simply for being intellectually honest, surely he ought to allow the good people of Delaware to imprison the same gentleman for two months. Of course there are thousands and thousands of good people in Delaware, people who hav been in other states, people who hav listened to Republican speeches, people who hav read the works of scientists, who hold the laws of 1740 in utter abhorrence; people who pity Judge Comegys, and who hav a kind of sympathy for the grand jury. You will see that at the last election Delaware lacked only six or seven hundred of being a civilized state, and probably in 1884 will stand redeemed and regenerated, with the laws of 1740 expunged from the statute books.

"Delaware has not had the best opportunities. You must remember that it is next to New Jersey, which is quite an obstacle in the path of progress. It is just beyond Maryland, which is another obstacle. I heard the other day that God originally made oysters with legs, and afterwards took them off, knowing that the people of Delaware would starve to death before they would run to catch anything.

"Judge Comegys is the last judge who will make such a charge in the United States. He has immortalized himself as the last milestone on that road. He is the last of his race. No more can be born. Outside of this he is probably a very clever man, and it may be does not believe a word that he utters. The probability is that he has underestimated the intelligence of the people of Delaware. I am afraid to think that he is entirely honest for fear that I may underestimate him intellectually and overestimate him morally. Nothing could tempt me to do this man injustice, though I could hardly add to the injury he has done himself. He has called attention to laws that ought to be repealed, and to lectures that ought to be repeated. I feel in my heart that he has done me a great service, second only to that for which I am indebted to the grand jury. Had the judge known me personally he probably would hav said nothing. Should I hav the misfortune to be arrested is his state, and sentenced to two months of solitary confinement, the judge, having become acquainted with me during the trial, would probably insist on spending most of his time in my cell. At the end of two months, he would, I think, lay himself liable to the charge of blasphemy, providing he had honor enough to express his honest thought.

"After all, it is all a question of honesty. Every man is right. I cannot convince myself there is any God who will ever damn a man for having been honest. This givs me a certain hope for the judge and the grand jury. For two or three days I hav been thinking what joy there must hav been in heaven when Jehovah heard that Delaware was on his side, and remarked to the angels, in the language of the late Adjutant-General Thomas, "The eyes of all Delaware are upon you!"

The Vice Society.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I must ask you to keep space open in your next issue for my report of the seventh annual public meeting of the New York Society for the (Manufacture of and the) Suppression of Vice, not having been able to get it ready for this week's number. The managers of that society hav learned a measure of prudence and discretion, taught them by our criticisms on their former meetings, which criticisms hav been echoed and improved upon throughout the country by the press generally, so that they omitted any mention of Infidels and blasphemers at this year's meeting. The lottery dealers are more legitimate game. The business of stamping out Freethinkers and blasphemers is transferred, just now, to Delaware, where Col. Ingersoll has given offense by not subscribing to the dogmas of the local church as protected by the local statutes, whether said statutes are or are not in accord with the Constitution of the United States, which is popularly supposed to guarantee liberty in religious opinion. The arrest and punishment of Col. Ingersoll for blasphemy might start a social earthquake that would improve the condition of public opinion in that most catholic state.

A. L. RAWSON.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 15, 1880, appeared a statement written by Charles S. Trenchard, of Aurora, Col., making very damaging accusations against Mr. A. F. Kibbee, of Brooklyn, N. Y. We hav since found them to be false in every particular, and Mr. Trenchard himself now writes a letter to that effect. Mr. Kibbee is known to friends of ours who can vouch for his character in every way. Mr. Trenchard's statements were made out of whole cloth, and we regret they should ever hav appeared in our paper.

[From the San Francisco Post.]

One of Moody's Converts.

"Is there no one else," said Mr. Hallenbeck the other night at an inquiry meeting, "who will rise and giv testimony?" There was silence for half a minute when a short, bull-necked, red-headed man with diagonally gazing eyes stood up, trembling with emotion. He said:

"Brethren, I've been a great sinner. I was the cause of an infant sister being scalded to death before I was four years old, and I frequently got drunk even at that early age. I broke my mother's heart before I was seven and sent her to the grave in such anguish of mind that she moaned for three days after she was dead, and it was a week before we could quiet her sufficiently to bury her.

Only six weeks ago, standing by the bedside of my aged father, he besought me with his last breath to reform, and I took out his false teeth before he was cold, went through his pockets, left him, and got cleaned out at faro in less than two hours. Here is a pawnbroker's ticket for his watch and chain. For thirty years, two weeks, one day, and forty minutes I never drew a sober breath, until I came into one of these revival meetings and heard the sermon about Daniel and the performing lions. That broke my heart—he was such a great lion tamer. And when I heard Mr. Sankey sing I became so troubled that I wanted to get out, but I couldn't on account of the crowd, and I had nothing I could throw at him.

"But I've found peace; I struck a piece the same night in a poker game. I don't mean that. That was the night before. I hav found true peace in believing, and when I am standing on the celestial battlements, just one blaze of glory, I shall hav the pleasure of telling the saints what I am now about to tell you, dear brethren—namely: that I am agent for Bilkin's Treasury of Art, complete in fifty-four parts, issued monthly, delivered free, 40 cents a month, and the most beautiful work of the present century. If all you sinners will step up and giv me your names as subscribers, you will find peace. I mean you will never regret—"

But at this juncture four deacons and two or three genuin converts yanked him bodily from the inquiry meeting, and, to their credit be it said, threw him half across the street, where he lay moaning feebly, "Complete in fifty-four parts, issued monthly." They watched him until one of Wells, Fargo & Co.'s large wagons came by and ran completely over him, and having satisfied themselvs that he was now at rest, returned to the inquiry meeting, announced the glad tidings, and sung the 148th hymn—the chorus of the last verse very softly.

How Would It Work?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A late issue of your paper contains an article on "Absolute Proofs of Continued Existence," by E. A. Chapman. Please introduce me to Mr. Chapman. Being rather inquisitiv, I would ask him some questions on some points which I can't convince myself of. For instance, we are together in a room with a medium, and a cabinet with red flannel stretched on three sides of it, and a curtain of the same material hung on a wire or rod in front. Well, the medium is securely tied with muslin strips to an upright stake fastened to the floor in the cabinet, where also are the various things to be used by the spirits, such as bells, guitars, tumblers, tambourines, etc. Then the curtain is closed, and in a short time the racket commences. I would say, also, that in this room are as many as six gas jets burning at full head, consequently considerable light penetrates into the cabinet. Now we (two of us) take seats say fifteen feet apart and six or eight feet from the front posts of the cabinet, one of us holding a small rope tightly tied around the medium's ankles. Now, the question to Mr. Chapman or any other man who may be able to enlighten an investigator is, Under the above condition would it retard the work of the spirits to hav one of us peep through one or two small holes or apertures in the cloth? This, to my knowledge, has never been allowed, here at least. I think this would be a good way to convince people of the "truths" of Spiritualism, and in such a light as mentioned every thing inside the cabinet could be plainly seen. I hav never been told the reason why this could not be done without disturbing the spirits. Mr. Editor, don't you think this would be a good test? I want some one to tell me why it would not, and when I hear from some one I will ask some more questions and giv some of my own convictions.

Yours truly, G. GUNNESON.

[The above is respectfully submitted to Mr. Chapman. It is not altogether in our line.—ED. T. S.]

The Millions who Do Not Go to Church.

We hav already presented statistics to show that fully half a million of the population of New York of an age to attend church are regularly absent from our churches on Sunday.

This great number is not chiefly made up of the vile and degraded, the vicious and the dissolute, of those who make no pretense of obedience to moral and religious principle. The greater part of these people who keep away from the churches and refuse to listen to the sermons of the preachers on Sunday are among the reputable, law-abiding, intelligent, industrious, and sincere inhabitants of the city. If any one should take a census to-day of the congregations in the churches and of those who remain away from them, for virtue and all the more estimable qualities of human nature, would not the absent majority compare favorably with the minority present in the temples of worship?

The Rev. Dr. Bellows answers yes to this question. And he has taken pains to proclaim the fact. He goes further and asks whether the signs do not show that church-going is so steadily declining that it will eventually fall into disuse altogether.

The Rev. Dr. Goodwin has been gathering statistics of church attendance in Chicago, and he finds that there, as in New York, the majority of the people regularly keep away from the churches. The Methodists hav one-third of their pews vacant every Sunday. It is very little better with the Baptists and the Episcopalians, and the Congregationalists hav more unoccupied sittings than any other denomination. The Protestant churches of Chicago hav together about 100,000 sittings, but only two-thirds of them are filled. Even if we add the attendants on the more frequented Roman Catholic churches, we should probably find that less than a quarter, perhaps not more than a fifth, of the half a million inhabitants of Chicago are church-goers.

And the same state of things seems to be of general prevalence. In the New England towns of large size, the churches are not increasing in membership, even where they are not actually falling off, and they hav a large proportion of vacant seats on every Sunday. Yet the population has steadily and greatly increased, so that, in relation to the whole number of inhabitants, the number or church-goers exhibits a large decrease compared with twenty-five years ago. Nor does church attendance make a better showing at the West. The Presbyterian churches of Illinois, for instance, instead of gaining membership, had, in 1880, 414 members less than they reported in 1879.

If the proportion of absentees from church which we find in New York and Chicago obtains throughout the country, they comprise of our fifty millions of people, between thirty and forty millions! Even if we deducted from this startling total the sick and disabled, infants, and others incapacitated for church-going, and also allowed a larger proportion of church attendants for the agricultural regions, we should find that the number of people who remained away from church far exceeded the number who frequented the houses of worship or of preaching.

And yet, with these many millions refusing to accept the proffered religous teaching, with the facts regarding the steady decline of church-going and the spread of Infidelity staring them in the face, our various religious denominations remain supine and doubtful of what means to adopt for meeting the perilous emergency.

A revival needed? Nothing is so much needed. But it must be a revival of pure and undefiled Christianity in the churches themselvs—among the Baptists, the Methodists, the Presbyterians, the Congregationalists, and the Episcopalians. They need a more vital faith and a more consistent practice. And when they all become Christians in deed as well as in name, we shall hav a revival that will be another Pentecost for the church.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.D.

Publisher's Preface to the German Edition.

The following narrativ was written in the winter of 1801–1802 at Bern, where the author, retired from public life, wished to dedicate his time to some useful purpose. Through intercourse he had become acquainted with many of those who were secretly troubled in spirit, and had learned or guessed at their hidden ailments who, entangled in doubts, had lost their God and the joys of their existence. He would attempt to re-establish in their souls the sacred belief and faith in virtue. The touching dream of a night inspired him; it was an angel that swept by him, but which he vainly tried to stop. As imperfect as was the narrativ that at first appeared in 1802 (published by Orell, Fuessli & Co., Zuerich), yet within the first decade it reached its fourth edition. This satisfied the author that he had not underestimated the usefulness of his work. Therefore he made some necessary, although still imperfect, improvements. May it yet serve to refresh and strengthen many a spirit!

FIRST BOOK.

CHAPTER I.

Abbe Dillon seated himself on a green grass-plot by the lake shore, shaded by an entangled foliage of trees hanging over us from the steep rocky wall.

"Here is room yet on my right and on my left," said he, and his eyes smilingly invited us to rest by his side. Roderick seated himself, and I followed. All three were yet in silence, occupied following the train of thoughts of our interrupted conversation.

On the opposit shore glowed the evening sky above the mountains, coloring the highest rocks and the peaceful Alpine huts with a mild rosy light. Golden stripes glimmered between bluish shades over the snowfields of the glaciers. In the distance the mountain peaks vanished in a violet hue among the clouds.

"By heaven!" exclaimed Roderick, who seemed to be deeply moved by the charms of the evening landscape, "how little is needed to be happy under the sun if one only nestles himself with childlike confidence closely to the bosom of the eternally good Mother Nature! She is blameless, she is holy; and he who loves her, him she sanctifies! And the anxious heart, excited by gloomy passions, reposes quietly on the maternal breast, and the hundreds of hopeless wishes are forgotten in a sigh of inmost contentment!"

"Excellent, my genial friend!" said I to him. "And if this inmost happiness should ultimately prove only a sweet delusion, whether we are for a brief space of time promoted to the ranks of the gods by the magic power of wine, or the melody of music, or the beautiful play of colors of a landscape or something else, is quite the same."

The abbe smiled. Roderick grew gloomy, and continued after awhile, "And do you not believe that one can be very blissful, nay, lastingly blissful?"

"Very blissful? Oh, yes!" I answered. "But lastingly blissful? Well, if also in that I am to agree with you, you must first definitly explain what you term 'Mother Nature.' You, dearest Roderick, are a poet; I am, unfortunately, a stiff, matter-of-fact man, who demands definit ideas. And therefore at times we do not at all agree, while our hearts always beat harmoniously. Let me speak open-heartedly. I took your exclamation at the sight of the lake scenery, so mildly illuminated by the setting sun, to be the result of your own happy disposition. But hav you always this happy disposition? Can you lastingly retain the same? Does it depend upon you, arbitrarily, to giv to or take from yourself emotions? Even feelings, even reason overwhelming emotions, belong to nature. You a e young, you love and are loved. A beautiful future floats before you. Your fancy indulges in magic play. You are happy. But a few years flutter by; your pulse beats slower; your hair grows white, and the paradise, that yet blooms before you, extinguishes with the setting sun. Man is no two days alike."

The abbe grew serious. Roberick appeared to become a little sensitiv. "And, with permission, what do you call happiness?" said he.

I answered: "Happiness I call contentment, and, if you will, pleasure, perchance. The happy man is so only through circumstances, only through circumstances answering his desires. The poor one is made happy through inheritance, the industrious through the blessing of his industry, the fame-thirsty through the celebrity of his name, the lover through returned love—but all this is the work of circumstances. These changed, and the happy one becomes miserable."

"That is not what I mean!" said Roderick; "I speak of a state of the soul in which one feels lastngly at peace with one's self."

"There is," I replied, "there is on earth no lasting happiness nor lasting unhappiness, because circumstances never remain the same, but daily change. But I know a certain state of mind and heart which I call blissfulness, because in this beautiful world two great ideas, soul and eternity, are mysteriously united. This state is independent of chance, above the vicissitudes of earthly things. The soul itself must prepare it, and it may last forever. Powerful time, even, which dries out our bodies, bleaches our hair, and devastates our senses, has no influence over it. Fortune can not increase nor misfortune diminish it. It is not connected with either, and it alone increases happiness and decreases misery. Is it this blissfulness, this inexhaustible contentment, Roderick, that you mean?"

"That's it!" exclaimed Roderick.

"Virtue, the spring is called. Not everybody on earth can be happy, but everybody on earth can create for himself this blissfulness. For within the breast of every mortal lies the moral law and the irresistible reverence for the same. The man who need not blush before himself in the remembrance of his own deeds, the man with pure heart, stands above the workings of destiny; he is equally blissful in the depths of misery as upon the hights of prosperity. We hav beneath the moon nothing under our control; outside of ourselvs nothing belongs to us lastingly. To become rich, renowned, and beloved does not depend upon us; to be virtuous depends on each individual's will. Fate is our master in everything, but over our virtue no fate has control. This is the blissful state for which all should strive, and, Roderick, it is really not so difficult. Act so that you never lose your self-respect!—behold, this is the thread that will lead us out of the labyrinth. Goodness of soul imparts to man that highness, that self-reliance, which makes him godlike and a citizen of two worlds. Before him the crowns of earth sink unattractiv in the dust, and death itself through him is deprived of its terrors. With virtue in my heart I am on earth in paradise. I desire an eternity, an imperishable existence of my soul beyond the grave, but I am not in need of that to complete my blissfulness here on earth. The virtuous man, independent of the world that surrounds him, elevated above fate's storms and sunshine, expects nothing even from a future after death. He is free. So is God free. The philosopher accepts what falls to him, as gift, as fortune, without demanding it as a recompense for sacrifices made. For that is no virtue that demands reward!"

Roderick stared at the ground before him, lost in meditation.

Abbe Dillon, who had hitherto remained silent, laid his arm around me, and pressed me to his bosom. "Friend," said he, "thy ideal of virtue is more than human. Like him, none has yet walked on earth. Ah, where is that holy soul which at the grave can smilingly renounce a recompensing eternity?"

"Your virtue is more terrible than lovable!" added Roderick.

I answered: "Dear friends, if I in my dying hour shall hav cool consciousness—if from this moment to the next were my last—so would I myself be the man with that awful renunciation, although I am none of the most virtuous among men. I hav no right to ask recompense for my virtue, consequently I need no eternity for it, and much less for my mistakes."

Roderick looked at me with doubtful eyes. "Really," said he, "I can hardly believe that you are speaking in earnest. Your virtue is an awful goddess, whom I cannot worship. No man, born of dust, will ever embrace her. A virtue which is so self-sufficient that she needs neither an eternity nor a god can only be an attribute of a god, and not of a tender, human heart."

"Your judgment is too severe," answered I. "We speak of that which might procure for us lasting blissfulness, independent of the fickleness of fortune. I say that the consciousness of having done right can accomplish this. My house can become the prey of flames; a revolution can annihilate my rights and bring me to poverty; death can overtake father, mother, sister in my arms. I shall suffer, intensely suffer, be very unhappy, but all this is not sufficient to destroy the inmost peace of my soul, for there will remain to me the one consolation that I am not to blame for these misfortunes! Were my grief so great that I could not master the thought; why weepest thou over the perishable? Could thou expect anything else from dust? then time would bring about what the strength of my soul would be unable to accomplish; it would heal the wound. A few years, and over the ruins of my hut and the graves of my loved ones will grow the moss of forgetfulness. With the consciousness of virtue in my heart I fear the sword of no tyrant, and no hemlock-bowl. I shall just as quietly receive alms as bestow them. I shall go to my grave with the same tranquility as to my bed. What can you say against that, dear abbe, and you, my beloved Roderick? Tell me, if you can, another source of blissfulness, beside this! I know only this, that so long as I am virtuous, the peace of my heart is preserved, and I am blissful. I need no other hope. It depends on me to be good, and, consequently to be lastingly blissful."

Liberal Bigotry.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is with much reluctance that I send you this, as I hav written and sent you so very much matter which has failed to find space in your paper; and presuming that this will meet with a like fate renders the task quite discouraging. Nevertheless, I hold to the principle that it is the editor's privilege to select his matter for publication and reject what he pleases.

I wish to pass a few remarks on Mr. John G. Hertwig's discourse on "Religious Liberty," as published in your issue of Jan. 8, 1881, and while I criticise so sharply his false philosophy of religion and social liberty, I trust he will take no offense, as we are dealing with facts and not with men.

First, our friend says that our American Constitution grants full religious liberty and unconditional liberty of conscience to every inhabitant of this land.

This is very true and likewise very just. But our friend Hertwig does not abide in this spirit of freedom and justice, but turns his weapons upon Mormonism and polygamy, and thereby becomes a violator of the Constitution which he had just set out to defend.

Polygamy has just as good a right to liv and be protected under our Constitution as has any other religious sect or order. It is not for us to discriminate between any religious orders, nor is it any of our business how many wives a man has nor how few, or whether he has any at all, so long as he deals justly and according to agreement with those he has, also so long as there is no compulsion in making women wives. And whosoever lends his voice or raises his hand to suppress polygamy or any other sect or order by compulsory means will hav pointed a weapon at the very heart of his own life and liberty, not excepting President Hayes nor Gen. Grant, nor even our good friend Mr. Hertwig.

I presume to be a Liberal in the broadest sense of the word, and it matters but little to me what my neighbor does nor what kind of a moral life he livs, so long as he does not infringe upon any personal or individual right of myself or neighbors.

Our friend further says that the Mormons by giving up polygamy, either voluntarily or forcibly, will cease to commit a crime, and will not surrender one iota of their religious liberty? What, force them to surrender the very forts of their religion, and then not deprive them of one iota of their religious liberty? Can it be possible that our friend calls this common sense for you and me to believe?

Laws cannot of themselvs make crimes. They may limit the freedom of action, and impose penalties and punishment on those who overreach those limits. Will our good friend Mr. Hertwig please point out the crime of polygamy in a sense to be received by the class called Liberals?

I will venture to say that there is a less violation of the true physiological laws of nature by polygamy than by the single-wife system, unless you hav become converts to Elmina's doctrins as presented in sexual reform.

Again, our friend seeks to deal a blow to Catholicism. But he is just about as far from truth and justice as he was in treating Mormonism. He terms Catholic priest celibacy compulsory. There is no such thing in Catholicism as compulsory celibacy. Like all other religious denominations, in has its peculiar system, and rules which denominate the order or sect, of which, to render one a member, he must submit to those rules laid down as the system of its peculiar order. No Catholic is compelled to be a priest, nor liv a celibate life; but if he chooses to become a priest, he must consent to the rule and liv a celibate life. Nor is any person compelled to become a priest or remain one contrary to his will, nor to become a Catholic, nor remain one, either in this country or any other that I hav any knowledge of.

All religious denominations or sects hav their peculiar hobbies—I call them superstitious hobbies—which distinguish them as such, and if any person wishes to become a member he is required to submit to each of them accordingly, let it be Mormonism, Catholicism, Methodism, or any other ism, and it is not for me nor any other person to seek to condemn or suppress any of them. If they derive any comfort or pleasure by uniting with any of these denominations and becoming members thereof, it is a matter belonging strictly to themselvs, which to interfere with or condemn would be an invasion on personal rights and religious liberty.

Our friend also pronounces the celibacy of Catholicism, as represented, fiendish and immoral. Wherein, pray, is it fiendish and immoral? Would not our Liberal friend pronounce celibacy a crime, like polygamy, and hav it amenable to some bigoted law of his own creating?—like many other laws of our land, a curse and an obstacle to human progress.

If the celibacy of Catholicism is compulsory, fiendish, and immoral, certainly the celibacy of Shakerism is much more so, because it is a requisit of each member and is compulsory in the strictest sense of the word with every member of the order. But, like the celibacy of Catholicism, it is only rendered so by the voluntary consent of each member.

Will not our friend say also that the celibacy of Shakerism is fiendish and immoral? And if it is fiendish and immoral, should it not, like polygamy, be amenable to some law? And I would ask our Liberal friend where on the face of the whole earth will we find a people that surpasses the Shakers in sobriety, veracity, and purity. Ah! they lead the world in these, and all other isms must sink into insignificance.

Shakerism and Mormonism are two extremes, but if we allow the door of discrimination to be opened for the purpose of suppressing Mormonism it will be only a matter of time when the suppression of Shakerism must follow in the catalog.

Mormonism, Shakerism, and every other ism, hav a perfect right to liv under the American Constitution as we now hav it, and any attempt to suppress any of them is an open violation of the Constitution of the American government; and when our presidents lend their word and influence to suppress Mormonism, or any other ism, simply to tickle the ear and please their bigoted constituents, it is an open disgrace to the American government.

If there is anything about Mormonism that is wrong or unjust it will prove a canker that will in its own good time destroy the vitals of its own system, without the intervention of any outside influence. In order to preserve and protect our liberty it is absolutely necessary that we do not meddle with the liberty of others—so long as the liberty they exercise does not infringe upon the rights and privileges of others. Let us see to it that woman is made the equal of man in every respect, then if there is any woman that wants a wife-sister or sisters, let her hav them. But I will venture to say that there will be but few who will desire such a relation, and that Mormonism will soon be a stranger in our land.

In closing this sharp criticism allow me to pass a few remarks on Jewish circumcision, the treatment of which our friend deserves great credit for introducing at this time. I consider that the position he occupies in relation to circumcision is substantially correct and just, and deserves the support of all Liberal people.

Circumcision is an infringement upon the infant's rights, and any person guilty of inflicting unnecessary pain upon an infant should be subject to a law that fixes a penalty. PETER SOULE.

Portlandville, N. Y.

A Letter from C. S. Rowley.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Although during the last two weeks we hav had the severest cold and storms of this extraordinary winter, I hav been out obtaining subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER and working in the interest of the National Liberal League to the best of my ability.

Spring Arbor, Mich., was the first place visited. This place with such a significant and poetic name is the hot-bed, so to speak, of the Free Methodists. This very enthusiastic and earnest sect of Christians hav a college at this place, and it seems to be the head-center of one of the most activ and earnest evangelical denominations in the Western states. There is said to be over one hundred students in this school, and many young men who are preparing for the "Christian ministry." It so happened that I was in this place on "recitation day," and I was kindly and cordially requested to be present at the recitals, and the professor, seeming to giv deference to my age, or for some other reasons, invited me to take a seat with him upon the rostrum, and he introduced me to the audience and said to the students and spectators in attendance that I would giv some recitations of original poetry, and thus favor the school with some examples in elocution. Suffice it to say that my efforts in these lines before this school, as in many others, appeared to be well-received, as I was the recipient of many congratulations and invitations to visit the place and run into the school again. I took a few subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER in the place and vicinity, and I only hope that the harmony and fraternity which seemed to spring up between this noted school and myself, as a visitor within its precincts, may not be disrupted upon ascertaining that my personal views upon religious subjects do not fully agree with the narrow sectarian sentiments of the patrons and leaders in the Spring Arbor college.

Albion, was the second place visited since I hav set out to work more directly in the interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER and of far-reaching and comprehensiv reforms, which, as I can clearly see, it anticipates.

I hav recommended THE TRUTH SEEKER as the best exponent and the ablest advocate and defender of the first principles of the American Constitution now published in the English language in any land, so far as I am informed.

There is no paper published in the world, I believe, which is the compeer of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the exposition of free speech, a free press, and the general principles of individual liberty and personal rights, which sentiments hav long existed among the American people as the idols and the ideals to be attained only in a more propitious future.

I took a few subscribers for the paper at Albion, among the wealthiest, the most intelligent and respectable families in the place.

I hav also visited Parma, and I hav met with some of the clearest heads, warmest hearts, and most activ, determined Liberals and Spiritualists in this place also.

In each and every place I hav visited or which I may visit hereafter, I wish to enlist as many as possible to open communication with THE TRUTH SEEKER and with the National Liberal League and to do all they will to spread the papers and the books or circulars, and thus in this most effectiv and permanent way and manner to help on the good work of enlightening and elevating the people in these most salutary lines of civilization and true refinement, which is but a more perfect naturalism.

Respectfully, C. S. ROWLEY.

That National Reform Association.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The National "Reform" Association has been formed "to maintain existing Christian features in the American government," such as Sabbath laws, the Bible in schools, etc. At a convention in the interest of this movement recently held in the First Methodist Episcopal church of Syracuse, N. Y., the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That civil society is founded, like the family, in human nature, and is, therefore, like the family, an arrangement and institution of God; that nations are moral persons, and are therefore accountable to the moral government of God and subject to his moral laws.

Resolved, That from the beginning of our national existence we hav regarded ourselvs and hav been regarded by other nations as a Christian people, and that it is both our duty and privilege to continue to maintain the Christian features of our government.

Resolved, That we view with anxiety the continual and too often successful assaults which are made upon all our Christian institutions, such as the use of the Bible in schools, the Sabbath laws, the Christian law of marriage, prayer in our state and national legislatures, etc., and recognize the duty which rests upon all Christian men to stand together for their defense.

Resolved, That a written Constitution formed for a Christian nation ought to contain a distinct declaration of the purpose of the nation to govern itself in a Christian manner, and we deplore the fact that the silence of our own Constitution in this respect is used as an argument against all that is Christian in the usage and administration of our government. We recognize the necessity of harmony between the written Constitution and the actual facts in the life of the nation; and we maintain that the true way to effect this harmony is not to abolish the Christian features in the administration of our government, but to introduce into the Constitution an explicit acknowledgment of those Christian principles which lie at the foundation of all government.

Resolved, That the amendment of our national Constitution so as to contain an acknowledgment of Almighty God as the source of authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations and his revealed will as of supreme authority would be no infringement of the rights of any class of our citizens, any more than similar acknowledgments, more or less explicit, in the Constitutions of nearly thirty of our states; but would be simply the exercise of a nation's undeniable right to acknowledge its God and to declare the fundamental principles on which its government rests.

Resolved, That such an amendment, so far from tending to any union of church and state, is directly opposed to such union, inasmuch as it recognizes the nation's direct relations to God, and insists that the nation should acknowledge these relations for itself, and not through the medium of any church establishment.

The resolutions are certainly explicit enough so that Liberals need not be misled.

Civil society has been developed to its present state by a natural process of evolution, and the idea that it is in any sense an "institution of God" is antagonistic to scientific truth. That notion is one of the numerous "twin relics of barbarism." Monarchs hav ever claimed to derive their powers from God, but under republics individuals hav been supposed to hav natural rights, not derived from God, which is practically only another name for church authority.

This church pretension of civil government being subordinate to "God's moral government" is subversiv of all liberty. It tends to center all power in the church. With the Constitution amended as proposed, the laws made in pursuance thereof would be such as the churches would dictate, and "God's moral government" would indeed be above the civil law. There would be a revival both of religion and the dark ages. True science and the higher civilization would receive a check such as the Greek and Roman civilizations received eighteen centuries ago. Let us hope the world is enough wiser now to effectually work to prevent the nations from being plunged into another thousand years of ignorance, filth, and superstition.

The theory of our government, "from the beginning," has been in favor of religious liberty, and Infidels, Jews, and Christians are alike entitled to its protection and its honors. Washington, Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Adams, Henry, and their compeers never risked their all to establish a government resting on one certain form of theology. No, the reverse of this is true. Drowning men grasp at straws. The churches will, of course, seek governmental recognition, indirect support, and even direct support, as their attendance and voluntary contributions fall off. It is fair to presume that there is about where the shoe pinches. In either case they want to be "charity angels."

The "Christian law of marriage." Just so. The recognition of marriage as a civil contract reduces the preacher's influence and his supply of greenbacks.

No Bible in school, no superstition; no superstition, no preach; "no preach, no pay." No Sunday laws, no pew rent; no prayer, no chaplaincies; no Thanksgiving, no turkey.

The last two resolutions are rather rich. No, the proposed amendment would not tend to any union of church and state. The state would simply do the dirty work for the church, and save the church all trouble and expense. Everybody could then join a secular society. Congress, under clerical instruction, could pass the appropriate laws to carry into effect the new amendment. There would be no question raised of repealing Comstock laws. Such blasphemous writers as Ingersoll and Bennett would be cared for at public expense. The wicked would cease from troubling, and the weary Christian souls would be at rest—the rest of mental and moral death.

It cannot be done. These pious "reformers" are on the earth a thousand years too late for such a project. Experimental knowledge has pushed the world out of their reach. Let them go back to their musty volumes and hold solemn communion with the fanatical old church Fathers. Without their aid, and without fear of their displeasure, the moral growth of mankind will go on hand in hand with material and intellectual progress. The scientifically enlightened man will not again go back to the ignorant savage for a model for machinery, government, or religion.

Gentlemen, your avocation is gone. Science no longer fears superstition. Knowledge ceases to go to school to ignorance. Man has at last chosen, once for all, for his guide the present dawn, the coming noonday, in place of the midnight darkness that marked the culminating point of the Christian system. For our race, that for more than a hundred thousand years has been groping in darkness and despair, the future is full of hope.

GEORGE W. MOREHOUSE.

Notes from Dakota.

Liberals are beginning to learn the lesson of compensation; that man pays for all he achieves; nothing for nothing, nothing from nothing, nothing remains. This is the law of the universe. Man must hav an intuition of an order beyond his comprehension of beauty, goodness, and justice in nature, beyond his dearest dreams of ideals beside which his own pale into insignificance. These are incentivs that will lift and never depress.

As I sit musing by my pleasant fire this evening the scenes of youth come trooping back again like the recollections of a splendid dream. All I am to-night I owe to Liberalism.

Liberalism is the morning star, "orthodoxy" the faint glimmer of a will-o'-the-wisp. There is a quiet and restfulness about Liberalism as of the stars asleep on the ocean's bosom, or the evening zephyr as it bears murmurs of peace on the scented breeze.

Liberalism is a sunbeam in the prison cell of the mind, and like kind words blesses him that givs and him that takes.

"Orthodoxy" is the stagnant pool, Liberalism the mighty ocean; the church is the magpie reveling in the carrion of antiquity, while Liberalism is the unwearied bird of the mountains, basking in the sunlight of the empyrean.

There is a fine opening in Dakota for Liberal lectures. The territory is fast filling up and the field should be taken at once before the tares are sown.

I meet people every day who say: "Mr. Goddard, what do you believe? Do you believe in a God?" I answer, No I do not believe in a God, but in God—Good—that's the way I spell it, and I know no devil save evil. Drop the d of devil and spell God, g-o-o-d, and you hav a pretty good creed. Good and evil—these are stern realities and no phantoms of the imagination.

But if you answer people as I am compelled to every day, they take it as an insult upon their mighty wisdom on the deity question.

I find a large part of my happiness in realizing the ideal; but more completely in idealizing the real.

The laws of correlation and conservation of energy and of attraction forever destroy the idea of creation or annihilation of either matter or force; yet Moses is still believed and the rib story is above par with the ignorant. It is the strangest thing in the world to me that Liberals do not establish schools and colleges for the promotion of their ideas and the facts of science.

Freethought cannot grow in the habitat of ignorance. CHARLES H. GODDARD.

What Objections to Christianity?

REPLY TO MR. MAIR'S FIFTH LETTER.—CONTINUED.

"Thousands of years have passed," says Prof. Clodd in his "Childhood of Religions," "since the Aryan nations separated to travel to the north and the south, the west and the east. They have each formed their languages; they have each founded empires and philosophies; they have each built temples and razed them to the ground; they have all grown older, and, it may be, wiser and better. . . . Besides having common names for their chief gods, the Aryans had words to express the duties which they felt must be fulfilled toward the powers whose smiles they coveted and whose frowns they feared, as sacrifice, prayer, altar, spirit. Sacrifice is the oldest of all rites. Man's first feeling toward the gods was fear. They ruled over all things. Life and death were in their hands, and therefore it seemed needful to offer them something to win their favor. When he saw that the blessings of heaven outnumbered the ills, fear gave place to love, and thank-offerings were made. As the feeling grew that the gods must be better as well as stronger, the desire to have their forgiveness for bad deeds done and for good deeds left undone led to sin-offerings."

No one pretends, so far as we are informed, to fix the precise era when the Aryans began to use written language, but that written language is of extreme antiquity is admitted on all hands. Which is the oldest form of written language is a matter of some dispute. Three principal forms of written language are recognized, to wit: 1. Hieroglyphics, or symbols; 2. Cuneiform, or arrow-head shaped characters, representing words; 3. The alphabet, phonetic characters representing sounds or letters. Some claim the greater antiquity for the cuneiform characters, while other learned writers insist with much reason that the first written language known to the human race was pictorial representations of animals and other objects in nature, by an ingenious system of which they managed to convey ideas and describe incidents. These hieroglyphics have been found largely in Egypt, Chaldea, and Assyria. In the latter two countries the famous cuneiform inscriptions were also largely used. These represent arbitrary words, not sounds or letters. The Chinese characters, though different in form, are similar in use; that nation has no alphabet. All written languages having an alphabet were devised long subsequent to the use of hieroglyphics, cuneiform, and Chinese characters. The alphabet is comparatively a modern invention which has been credited to the Phœnicians. The Hebrew and Greek, having an alphabet, in comparison with the hieroglyphics and cuneiform and Chinese inscriptions, are counted modern languages. I saw in the British Museum numerous tablets and cylinders filled with cuneiform characters, believed to have been made not less than four thousand years ago; and I there also saw the celebrated Rosetta stone, a little more than three feet one way by two feet the other, and about ten inches thick, covered with hieroglyphics and characters, discovered in Egypt about a hundred years ago. Though it is believed to have been engraved but a few centuries before our era, it furnished a very convenient key for the far more ancient inscriptions on obelisks, temples, rocks, etc. I saw the Egyptian obelisk in London, another in Paris, and eight others in Rome. Nearly all of them are covered with hieroglyphic characters which are dated back nearly four thousand years. The obelisk brought from Egypt and recently erected in our own Central Park represents the same age of antiquity, and is claimed to be very close upon four thousand years old—undoubtedly cut, inscribed, and erected before Moses was born, if such a character ever lived. Whether Egypt or India is the elder, it is clear from the Bible itself that the Egyptians are a much older nation than the Jews, for when Abraham, the accredited father of the Jews, was a comparatively young man, he journeyed into Egypt, where he found a powerful nation having a king, armies, cities, and a wealthy country.

It is highly probable that man existed on the earth tens of thousands of years before he had progressed far enough to have a written language. His progress has ever been slow and gradual, and this was undoubtedly the case in his primitive condition. For ages it is believed he was so rude and savage that his spoken language was of the most imperfect character, containing but a few words to express his urgent wants. As he increased in intelligence his language also increased, and when he became so far advanced as to be able to i[illegible] though[illegible] tablets, papyrus, and the skins of animals, many thousands of years must have passed away.

The Vedas of the Aryan race, the ancient Hindoos, are claimed to be the oldest literature in existence. They consist of hymns of praise and adoration, couched in sublime language and addressed to the powers and forces of nature, personified by the gods Indra, Varuna, Agni, etc. Authors differ to the extent of thousands of years as to the antiquity of the period when the Vedas were written, but they are far older than any known writings of the Semitic race, or the Jews. It is probable the version of the Vedas as now known is a compilation of far older thoughts and aspirations, uttered many centuries before, and handed down orally as a legend from generation to generation.

The belief in Brahma has been accepted thousands of years, but the Vedas are far older. They hav existed and were used and sung long before Brahma was worshiped or his name uttered. The Institutes of Menu, though accredited an antiquity of three thousand years before our era, are young in comparison to the older Vedic hymns.

Haug, Wilson, Jones, Muir, Muller, Whitney, and the numerous others who hav studied and written up the subject of oriental religions, differ, as observed, thousands of years as to the age of the older Vedas. Max Muller, who gives them less antiquity than most others, places it at 1200–1500 B.C.; Prof. Whitney, 1600–2000 B.C.; while Dr. Haug believes the eldest to be 2000–2400 B.C. Talleyrand, one of the ablest men that France or the world has produced, in his celebrated letter to Pope Pius VII., in alluding to the antiquity of the human race, said: "Monuments in Asia are still in existence whose authenticity cannot be doubted, and which prove an antiquity of at least fifty thousand years. And indeed we find in Egypt, Ethiopia, Arabia Felix, and Chaldea the remains of an antiquity whose splendid origin is lost in darkness. India, a country as vast as Europe, with a more dense population, claims a still greater antiquity. China and Japan trace to 54,000, the beginning of civilization, which they prove by an unbroken series of records, and by monuments and inscriptions on marble, stone, iron, and copper, the existence of which fills the mind with admiration at the ingenuity of man in those remote ages. Even Tartary—barren and uncultivated Tartary—exhibits in its extensive deserts the noble relics of the remotest civilization. . . . At the very time which Moses fixed upon for the creation of all things, the Hindoos had lived five thousand years in a state of high civilization, with a ppoulation of 200,000,000. Forty-eight thousand years before Moses, China contained a still larger population than India. Many thousand years before the time in which you assume, most holy father, that Adam was created, the three continents of Asia, Africa, and Europe, were inhabited, with the sole exception of the vast and sandy deserts found in some parts of Tartary, Arabia, and Africa. But wherever in the midst of these sandy plains and deserts a fertile spot was met with, it was natural for its inhabitants to fancy that they were the originators of the human race; and the same idea would naturally occur to those who lived in islands which were seldom or never visited till navigation became better understood and more extensively practiced. Even in America, although its discovery by Europeans dates only a few centuries, remains of antiquity are found there which carry back the epoch of its existence to a period not to be included in the chronology of the world by Moses.

"The high state of civilization of the first known nations, such as the Chinese, the Indians, the Chaldeans, the Arabs, the Greeks, and the Ethiopians, is presumptiv evidence of their stand on progressiv civilization—a stand which must hav lasted many thousand years; and therefore when the Chinese prove that they were a civilized people fifty-four thousand years ago, while the Indian claims one of still greater antiquity, we must necessarily suppose that thousands of years elapsed before they discovered the art of representing ideas or thoughts by means of characters or figures engraved upon marble or metal. It is then evident, most holy father, that among the many blunders made by Moses in Genesis not the least of them was fixing the time of his creation of the world at a time when the earth not only did exist, but had an immense population, and actually reckoned 50,000 years of civilization; besides his pretending to look upon the Hebrews as the foremost ancient people on earth, forgetting, or feigning to forget, that they were a mere gang of slaves, who had originally escaped from Idumea during the internal dissensions which desolated that country. After having passed into Egypt they still preserved their primitiv conditions, and it was only after the lapse of many years, and after having robbed their masters (as their forefathers had formerly robbed the Idumeans) that, induced by Moses, they crossed the Red Sea in Ethiopian vessels; and having entered Arabia Deserta, they gained the woods of Henon, where they maintained themselvs during forty years, living by robberies and plunders they committed at night on the people in the neighborhood, the produce from these robberies being called by Moses "manna from heaven." It was here the[illegible] Mithras, the mediator. He said that Oromazes Moses, having ascended Mount Sinai, gave them the moral law which became the basis of the Jewish religion, and which in time became also the cornerstone of other religions."

The claim that the Jewish scriptures are the oldest records in the world is most absurd, and cannot be sustained. Moses is claimed to be the author of the oldest portion of them, and he flourished, according to the chronology of the book itself, fifteen hundred years before the Christian era. That men wrote and inscribed long before that time is most clear. Unfortunately, however, for the antiquity of the Pentateuch and other portions of the Jewish Bible, there is no proof that Moses wrote any part of it, or that any portion of it was written more than seven or eight centuries before the time of Christ, and probably not much of it previous to the fourth or fifth century before our era—after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. I will undertake to show this fact as we get along further with our discussion. As modern as the Greek nation and mythology may be considered, there are excellent grounds for regarding them as older than the Jewish nation. It is admitted that Homer and Hesiod lived nearly a thousand years before our era, and that they sung of their gods, of the battles that had been fought and victories won. I think you will be unable to prove that any part of the Jewish scriptures were in existence at that time.

In passing, it may be well to say a little more about the antiquity of the Persians and their religion. That they existed contemporaneous with the Aryans, of which family they were a branch, and occupied adjoining territory, is very evident. As with India, China, and other countries, there is not a little uncertainty as to how far into remote antiquity we have to penetrate to obtain the earliest information about that people. They were the founders of the Magian religion, the original sun and fire-worshipers, of whom the Parsees are the descendants. Zoroaster was their great philosopher, teacher, and prophet, and his period of life is variously estimated at from five hundred to six thousand years before our era.

Heeren, the historian, after giving a description of the splendid palace of Darius at Persepolis, uses this language: "Solitary in their situation, peculiar in their character, these ruins rise above the deluge of years which have overwhelmed all the records of human grandeur around them, and buried all traces of Susa and Babylon. Their venerable antiquity and majestic proportions do not more command our reverence than the mystery which involves their construction awakens the curiosity of the most unobservant spectator. Pillars which belong to no known order of architecture, inscriptions in an alphabet which continues an enigma, fabulous animals which stand as guards at the entrance, the multiplicity of allegorical figures which decorate the walls, all conspire to carry us back to ages of the most remote antiquity, over which the traditions of the East shed a doubtful and wavering light."

Diodorus Siculus describes the same Persepolis, the tombs of the ancient kings, etc. Ctesias says that "Darius, the son of Hystaspes, had a tomb prepared for himself in the double mountain during his lifetime, and that his parents were drawn up with cords to see it, but fell and were killed." These tombs still exist among the ruins on the face of the mountain. The figures of the kings are carved thereon. One of them is standing before an altar, on which a fire is burning. Above the altar is a ball representing the sun. Over the effigy of the king is suspended a winged, half-length figure in fainter lines, and resembling him. In other places he is seen contending with a winged animal like a griffin.

Clarke thus comments on these ancient ruins: "All this points at the great Iranic religion, the religion of Persia and its monarchs for many centuries; the religion of which Zoroaster was the great prophet, and the Avesta the sacred book. The king, as servant of Ormuzd, is worshiping the fire and the sun—symbols of the god; he resists the impure griffin, the creature of Ahriman; and the half-length figure over his head is the surest evidence of the religion of Zoroaster. For according to the Avesta, every created being has its archetype or Fereur (Ferver, Fravashis), which is its ideal essence, first created by the thought of Ormuzd himself, as his Fravashis, and these angelic essences are everywhere objects of worship to the disciples of Zoroaster. We have thus found in Persepolis, not only the palace of the great kings of Persia, but that most ancient system of dualism, the system of Zoroaster."

The early age of Zoroaster may be appreciated in that Plato wrote of him four hundred years before our era, and that Herodotus, who wrote still earlier, minutely described the religion of his followers, which was of the same character as the religion of the Parsees practiced many centuries since. Plutarch also wrote of Zoroaster and the Magians and set their era five thousand years before the Trojan times, or nearly six thousand years before the Christian era. He mentions the two principles of good and evil, Oromazes, or Ormuzd, and Arimanius, or Ahriman; sprung from the purest light, and Arimanius the opposite, from pitchy darkness. The first made six gods, of benevolence, truth, justice, wisdom, wealth, and pleasure. Arimanius on the other hand made a like number of contrary or evil spirits to oppose them.

As the Assyrians conquered Bactria, the home of Zoroaster, twelve hundred years before the Christian era, and this was the last of the Iranic kingdoms, they having previously vanquished the Medes, Hycranians, Parthians, Persians, etc., and as Zoroaster must have lived before this conquest, his time is taken back to a period no less remote than 1,300 B.C. Bunsen suggests that the date of the great teacher was fixed by Aristotle, which carries it back not less than 6,000 years before the Christian era. He and Eudoxus, according to Pliny, place him six thousand years before the death or Plato; Hermippus five thousand years before the Trojan war or about 6,350 B.C. Bunsen adds, "At the present stage of the inquiry the question whether this date is set too high cannot be answered either in the negative or affirmative." Spiegel in one of his latest works considers Zoroaster as a neighbor and contemporary of Abraham, therefore as living 2,000 B.C., instead of 6,350. Dollinger sets his time as somewhat later than that of Moses, adding that it is impossible to definitely fix the date. Rawlinson remarks that Berosus places him anterior to 2,234 B.C. Haug inclines to fix the date of the Gathas, the oldest songs of the Avestà, as early as the time of Moses. Rapp, after a thorough comparison of ancient writers, concludes that Zoroaster lived 1,200 or 1,300 B.C. In this he agrees with Duncker. This is not far from the period given by Xanthus of Sardis, a contemporary of Darius, the oldest Greek writer who speaks of Zoroaster. It is also the period given by Cephalion, a writer of the second century, who took it from three independent sources. These data are taken principally from James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions."

Like all the religious teachers of antiquity, Zoroaster's life was invested with portents, omens, and remarkable dreams. His mother was much perturbed before his birth lest some evil should befall him when born, but a good spirit allayed her fears by assuring her that Ormuzd would protect him; that the world was waiting for him, and that he should be a prophet to his people. When he was born, however, the evil spirits obtained possession of him and threw him into flames of fire, but he was not injured in the slightest degree, coming out unharmed and refreshed as from a bath. He was under divine protection through his infancy and youth, and when he attained to manhood he retired to a holy mountain, devoting himself to pious meditations and communion with God. Upon his descent from the holy mountain he bore with him tables of stone, or books of law, which had been revealed to him by Ormuzd on the holy mountain. The same subsequently became a part of the Zend-Avesta, or the Living Word, the bible of the ancient Persians. This legend, as will be seen, bears a striking resemblance to the supposed later legend of Moses, who also went up into a burning mountain, held an interview with Jahveh, and, returning, bore with him tables of God's word.

The close resemblance between the religion of Zoroaster, on the one hand, and Judaism and Christianity on the other, were sufficiently pointed out in my last letter. A study of these will explicitly show that the more ancient system of Zoroastrinism contained about every conception and dogma, rite, sacrament, and ceremony, that later on distinguished Judaism and its partial outgrowth, Christianity.

We have, however, less to do just now with the origin of Judaism than with the origin of its child, Christianity, and the individual whose name it bears. To arrive at the strongest probabilities in this direction is about all that can be accomplished. There is no historical proof that the character Jesus had a real existence, though it is quite possible that one or more persons by that name existed in Judea nearly two thousand years ago. In this connection I will give the views of writers and others who have given much attention to the subject respecting the origin of the Jesus story.

First I will make another somewhat extended quotation from Talleyrand's letter, before alluded to, beginning on page 43: "All religious opinions, whatever might be their diversity or tendency, were tolerated in the Roman empire; Christians and Christianity alone were excepted on account of their origin from Judaism. The first apostles of this religion were vulgar men without any talent. When they endeavored by their new doctrine to destroy the prejudices of the people, who were brutified by education, if they and their successors had been more skilful or better read in Greek authors, and had meditated on them, more particulaaly on the life and death of the great Plato, they certainly would have gathered from an attentive perusal of his writings a purer, holier, and more perfect code of morals than the one they put in the mouth of their Christ; but they attributed to him a hodge-podge of doctrines, which the learned could never understand; and though this horde of mistifiers of Plato have been by public opinion reduced to their former state of obscurity, yet the baneful effects of the whole system have been incalculable, especially among the lower classes, by preventing the adoption of Plato's superior ethics. Plato ceased his useful career some centuries before Moses was born; and this is the reason why his manner of living, his prudence, his disinterestedness, his moderation and goodness, and many other qualities, were only known to philosophers. If Moses had been thus gifted, his code of morals would have been based upon the same philosophical foundation, and its inculcation would have produced the most salutary effects on the minds of the Roman slaves among whom it was as entirely unknown as the name of its its sacred author.

"If Jesus had been described by the same pen and endowed with the same attributes which Plato selected for his just man, the picture of his virtues no doubt would have inspired the new catechumen with sympathetic interest for the wrongs of others.

"The virtues of Plato's just man, abused, while he lived, by a rude and ignorant people, and then consigned to die by the hand of a public executioner, could not fail to make an impression on the minds of slaves who were dragging similar chains, and suffering from the same contempt. The doctrines of the just man, who promised consolations in this life, and opened the gates of heaven in the next—these doctrines, I say, which confounded all classes and which called all men without distinction to the enjoyment of the same bliss, could not but be eagerly caught at by the unfortunate wretches, who, whilst dragging in this life chains of bondage, saw in death the end of their misery, and in heaven a reward for what they had suffered on earth. Had the doctrines of Plato found an echo in Jesus, and had they then been preached with perseverance to the slaves, it would have realized in this world all the fictitious happiness promised in the imaginary heaven above; but his apostles, by not adding the example to the precepts, made Christianity from the very beginning look, in the eyes of the well-informed, as a schism derived from Judaism, which led to others no less natural. Some looked upon Christ as the son of God, and as God himself, but begotten on a virgin by the operation of the Holy Ghost. [Fo, one of the Chinese gods, was also born of a virgin who had been impregnated by a ray of the sun. Brahma and Sammonocodo took upon themselves the human nature, and Vishnu no less than five hundred times.] Others, however, looked on him only as a man predestined by God to make his will known. These, although they denied his divinity, looked upon him as filled with the Holy Ghost.

"The scandal caused by so many contrary opinions on a subject which it was of great importance should have remained undebated drew it to the attention of the Roman Senate, who saw only a band of adventurers in the Christian sect. Obliged to hide themselves to escape the penalties of the law, they sought an asylum among the intricate catacombs and quarries situated in the suburbs of Rome, where a thousand windings enabled them to frustrate every effort made to discover them.

"The different opinions which the first Christians entertained concerning the nature of Christ led the Senate to institute inquiries in the country in which he was born, and thus they became acquainted with the origin of Mary's son.

"Affidavits procured in the very center of Palestine and in the places fixed upon by the Senate were sent to Rome with the most conclusive evidence of the correctness of the report.

"These affidavits proved that Mary, who was of the tribe of Levi, and wife of the carpenter Joseph, who was himself of the tribe of Judah, had had an illicit intercourse with a Roman soldier named Panther, who served in the fourteenth legion stationed in Egypt, whence he was detached into Palestine. From this criminal intercourse it seems that a child was born whom they called Arenias, and who was adopted by Joseph according to the Roman practice, although it was contrary to the Jewish customs.

"With this Joseph he learned the carpenter's trade; but after the death of his putative father he abandoned his home and mother and became a vagrant. Having met with a few vagabonds like himself, they all took the road to Galilee, where they lived for some time by begging. Having at last become the leader of a band of robbers, he was arrested by the police of Jerusalem, and finally condemned to death by the general acclamation of the whole people.

"Such, most holy father, was the hero of your religion, and such were the first fruits gathered on that tree of which you now are the head. But it is only by pursuing the same system of imposition and wickedness that your predecessors and yourself have been able still to retain spiritual and temporal power with a portion of mankind. However, it is a great pity, as far as your nefarious scheme is concerned, that the apostles undertook to dispute about the nature of their Christ, for this, as we have seen, led to inquiries about his origin, which ended in showing that his bastardy was his only claim to a distinction from the generality of mankind.

"You cannot deny, most holy father, that the church of Christ, whenever the priesthood could be benefited by it, have always set up the standard of rebellion; and having once roused up the passions of the ignorant, they continued to keep alive the most scandalous dissensions among the people. If this church had laid aside the boasted morality it has placed in the mouth of the self-styled sacred priest, it would have saved to Europe oceans of blood; and if, on the contrary, the sublime and pure morality of Plato had been adopted in its stead, or if this Greek philosopher had been looked upon and acknowledged as a true legislator who could be profitably followed, certainly mankind, and Europe more especially, would not have looked for a legislator in a corner of Asia, and amidst an abject nation justly detested by the whole world. Plato (and this ought to be a high recommendation with those who delight in dreams) was the first man who discoursed on the immortality of the soul, who drew a picture of paradise and of the happiness we would enjoy there. He was the first man who promised rewards and a crown of glory to the virtuous who had suffered on earth, while he threatened the wicked with the severest punishments. Again, Plato was the first man who spoke of a purgatory as a place where unrepented souls went to atone for certain sins committed in this world. [Three thousand five hundred years before the pretended mission of Christ, the Brahmans had invented a purgatory in which the bad angels were to remain one thousand years. St. Augustine condemned the disciples of Origen as heretics, because they admitted a purgatory; but, as souls are now redeemed from this place by means of masses and prayers, and those masses and prayers are not to be had without money, the popes and their worthy satellites have discovered that St. Augustine was wrong.] He was the first man who described a third place of terror and horror, where kings, popes, priests, tyrants, and all impostors ought to suffer eternally as a meet reward for their crimes. Plato was the first man who spoke of the felicity prepared for little children, whom he calls "heaven's angels;" it was him who assigned the same glorious and happy posthumous existence to youths of either sex who should die guiltless from all commerce of sexes; these he called "heaven's seraphims," and said that, floating or immerged in vast oceans of light, they joined the choirs of angels, who sang canticles of praises in honor of virtue. In this delightful place were admitted all virtuous husbands and wives; all dutiful children who took care of their decrepit parents; all those who had the gift of speech and did not abuse it by falsehoods; all those who had a pure and feeling heart; all those who scrupulously respected the property of others; all those who relieved the wants of the poor and imparted consolations to the unhappy; and, finally, all those who advocated civil equality, and to humble the pride of kings and tyrants, came courageously forward in defense of their country and their rights.

"Then be candid, most holy father, and frankly confess that whatever is good or sublime in the religion of your God was plundered from Plato's works, and that the morality of the just man traced by the majestic pencil of this divine philosopher ought never to have been called Christian but Platonic morality, and therefore that your title ought to be 'The servant of God and vicar of Plato.'

"If the apostles had styled themselves Platonicians instead of Christians, or if they had modeled their doctrines on the morality of the Grecian just man instead of adopting the gross compound of Jewish ethics, it is more than probable that neither the Roman Senate nor the tribunals would have proscribed their opinions; but these ignorant fanatics compiled a heterogeneous mass of that which was held most sacred in the ethics of the just man with all that was gross and licentious in Judaism, and this brought on them the just hatred and ill-will of every moral man. But what enraged above all the Romans and the philosophers of that time was the stupidity and impudence of catechumens who sought out of Judea a mean wretch, and in their ravings made him lord of heaven, earth, and the whole universe. So barefaced was the knavery of these Christian priests that they hesitated not to make their puppet God talk in the most indecorous manner, that thereby they might have an apology for the gratification of their own evil propensities.

"What audacity! what impudence! Were I sure, most holy father, that there is a supreme being to resent such abominations, I would call on his offended majesty to prepare his thunderbolts and to annihilate at one tremendous blow the whole brood of priests."

Repairing Paine's Monument.

The subscriptions for this necessary work hav not come in as freely as desirable. It would seem that the only monument in the country erected to the memory of the man we so much revere should not go another year in the dilapidated condition in which it now is. The following are the sums donated up to the present time:

M. Reiman,	$5.00	Dr. E. B. Foote,	$1.00
Infidelis,	1.00	H. B. Brown,	1.00
D. M. Bennett,	1.00	Rufus Perkins,	1.00
W. F. Porter,	.25	Augustus Owen,	1.00
G. S. Mc——,	1.00	E. M. Macdonald,	1.00

Let the generous-hearted who honor the memory of Thomas Paine help a little in the needful work.

Intemperance.

Intemperance not only destroys the health but inflicts ruin upon the young and helpless, for it invades the family and social circle and spreads woe and sorrow all around it, cuts down youth in all its vigor, and manhood in its strength, and age in its weakness. The drunkard may hav possessed a heart overflowing with human kindness whose boyhood days were hallowed by high and noble aspirations; and had the teachings of a kind and loving mother been followed through life what a noble man he might hav been! but no, like many others he fell; and how? through the use of intoxicating drink, perhaps by seeing men who profess to be Christians frequenting these places and taking the social glass as they term it. He is led on step by step until at last he is ruined—eternally damned, the Christians say; but are they the ones to lend him the helping hand to raise him from the gutter and place his feet upon a firm foundation? No, instead of that they pass him by and say, I never knew you; and it may be that through their influence he took his first glass, for we all know the Christians drink as well as those who do not profess to be Christians. And are things to go on in this way, ruining both body and mind of earth's noblest sons. Methinks I hear an answer, No. But how is it to be stopped? The answer comes, By prayer, and prayer alone. I answer, By law, and law alone.

Do you believe a God that will command the sun and moon to stand still while one of his chosen band slays thousands of the human family will answer prayer in behalf of a mother's lost and ruined son? You call God merciful and just! Is there any justice or mercy in his allowing hundreds, yes, thousands, to be ruined by the use of strong drink, when, as you say, he can stop anything, yes, everything, by the lifting of his hand? Is it through the mercy of this all-wise being that homes are made desolate, wives robbed of their husbands, mothers of their sons, and children of their fathers. This is mockery. Better be an Ingersoll, a Paine, or a Mrs. E. D. Slenker, than one of these so-called Christians.

What does their religion teach? It teaches instead of giving to an unknown God, "Raise the fallen, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and giv to the poor."

This, my friends, is what you term Infidelity. This is the religion taught by D. M. Bennett, he that through the conniving of the church was thrust into prison, and taken from his family for thirteen long months; and why, because they were afraid that through his influence the church would be ruined. And is it through the prayers of such a body that we are to be freed from this bondage of intemperance that is devastating our land from east to west, from north to south? Nothing but law will free us from this vile curse and restore to us our once happy homes, kind husbands and fathers, and affectionate sons, make glad-eyed women out of weeping wives and sorrowing mothers, and make children that would shrink when they heard the dread footsteps rush to meet father at the door. This, my friends, and not prayer, is the only effectual way.

Wine Drinking.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Friend E. Bartlett, of Monroe, Wisconsin, in his letter of November 28, 1880, is very intemperate in his opinions in criticising D. M. Bennett's personal views upon the use and the abuse of a little wine for the stomach's sake and often infirmities, as Paul, the apostle of Christianity, recommended it, who thanked God that he came in sight of a tavern where he could be refreshed on his way from Malta to Patmos. Christ, to whom the Christian world is daily bending its knee as the great redeemer of mankind, turned water into wine at the marriage feast at Cana in Galilee, not that he wished the guests to become intemperate or intoxicated, but to use it for what it was intended—for man to drink and be merry, for where a crowd gathers together to be merry happiness also abounds.

Drunkenness is an evil, and the condemnation is great that is pronounced against the unfortunate inebriate—"The drunkard shall not enter the kingdom of heaven." Why do Christians violate that terrifying command and endanger their future happiness? Men of Infidel or Liberal ideas always know when they hav enough of anything that is pleasing to their taste. Their appetites don't become intemperate, for it would destroy their surrounding pleasure.

Dr. William Parker asks the question, "What is alcohol?" A poison. It is an extract in the process of distilling, but you can use it with safety as a beverage by diluting it with water. Fusil oil is more poisonous and dangerous, but we do not use it when we indulge in strong drink when it is pure and unadulterated. Pure liquor, when moderately used, is a better medicin for the human or animal system than many of the medicins prescribed from the school of Dr. Parker.

Friend Bartlett quotes from Dr. Parker again, who says, "Alcohol is the one evil genius, whether in wine or ale or whisky, and is killing the race." That is to be understood in the abuse or excess in the use of it, particularly when we hav an inferior grade of liquors flooding our American market since the accursed Maine law came into existence by the legislativ influence of pretended Christians with narrow-minded intellects and despotic souls.

Our laws are good to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors to the American Indian, for when they use it to excess they become frantic, barbarous, and dangerous to be near white people. We don't find the kings or queens of Europe, or the better educated class of society, committing crimes injurious to their neighbors by the use of intoxicating liquors.

I agree with my reformed friend Bartlett, who has seen much of the horrors of delirium tremens, that I should be very much disgusted at such intemperate abuses in the use of wine, whisky, ale, or cider. We don't, as a common practice, arrest a man for murder or for horse-stealing or for housebreaking or for arson whom the officers of the law find intoxicated, for that class of unworthy citizens must perform their dirty work while perfectly sober to make their business a success.

If intelligent men hav not more control of their intemperate habits than by going into a reform club with proscriptiv laws of teetotal abstaining, I think such specimens of humanity and progressiv ideas ought to be buried in oblivion. No liberal son of American freedom should countenance prohibition laws, Maine laws, municipal, national, or local laws to be fastened round the necks of the American people as despotic fetters to rob the workingman of his beer. In the dark days of our Revolution, at the battle of Brandywine, it was the stimulant from the intoxicating beverage that made the weary soldier rejoice onward and onward to victory. If they had the delirium tremens, where would they hav been? In a drunkard's grave. But they did not use it intemperately, and it gave them cheer and encouragement in the arduous task they had to perform.

Temperance orators and pulpit orators are two necessary evils in a reform club. They are like a lighted candle—the blaze and the wick are close together; always anxious to tamper with human rights and sustain religious wrongs. I hav spent considerable of my time in some of these temperance reform clubs, and I know something of their general training. It is useless to enter into detail.

For a good, sound, logical advice, I would recommend friend Bartlett to study more closely into D. M. Bennett's views on the temperate or moderate use of wine. For the purpose of searching all questions that may agitate the mind of the American public, I trust you will giv this a space in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Respectfully yours,

St. Joseph, Mo. M. H. BLACKFORD.

Lecture Notes.

From Illinois to New York is but a short distance in this age of palace cars.

Until the last month I hav been doing battle for Liberalism in Chicago and vicinity. On the 6th of January I transferred my field of operation to the old Empire state. For several Sundays previous to my departure from Illinois I spoke to large and enthusiastic audiences at Elgin, which is a thriving, energetic town.

The Liberal League there numbers some twenty-five members, and is in a prosperous and healthy condition. It indorses the action of the National League at Chicago. Its originator is Mr. I. W. Archibald, a Liberal who is a Liberal in more than one sense of the word. He is always alive to the interests of the League. He has some excellent supporters in Mr. James Metcalf, Wm. Saunders, and others.

Arriving at Port Jervis, N. Y., I found a League of fifty members, who hav rented a hall for the year and propose to keep their light "trimmed and burning." The seating capacity of the room is about four hundred, and at each lecture it has been filled to overflowing. The energetic officers of the League provide fine music at each session, and thus the people who assemble are ministered to in various ways. This is my second month's engagement with this prosperous organization.

On the 27th of January I left here for Linesville, Pa., Paine celebration, being absent one week. There also I found a large, prosperous, and live League. They hav a hall which they rent by the year, adorned with mottoes, evergreens, and pictures. It proved too small, however, to contain the crowds who came from far and near to do honor to the memory of Thomas Paine. For seven sessions they came and went, and feasted on the mental pabulum provided for them; and, best of all, the clergy came out to hear and showed their colors right bravely, questioning and replying to the disciples of the new dispensation. Altogether, the Linesville celebration was a success, financially as well as otherwise; and the energetic and efficient officers and members of that League deserve to hav their names and efforts heralded far and near. Other Leagues in larger towns would do well to pattern after brave League No. 36.

At the close of the celebration Messrs. Hull and Jamieson began a debate on Spiritualism vs. Materialism. It is hardly necessary to say that with two such champions of their respectiv causes the battle was full of interest to the auditors. Leagues should make it a point to secure the services of these gentlemen for a debate. No fear need be had of creating dissension among the members who differ in their views upon these questions. Courteous, pleasant, firm friends, but unsparing of each other's arguments, Moses Hull and Prof. Jamieson beautifully exemplify the Liberalism of which they are they are the distinguished advocates. I trust they may be heard from the lakes to the Pacific coast. Every community securing their services will be mentally enriched.

I find as I wander over the country much reason for encouragement in the cause of Liberalism. Yet, enthusiast that I am, I can but lament that every League is not inspired with the missionary spirit, and every community alive to questions of vital interest to all, viz., the liberation of the minds of the people from superstition and the development of a Liberalism so broad that no soul need feel the shadow of a bond. Oppression is at work on every hand, ever activ, ever vigilant. The tyranny of creed and capital (twin devils who would bind the limbs of liberty) is crushing many a life, and though they cry, "How long, O Lord! how long?" bewildered, dazed, and cowardly, they still refuse to act.

Ah, fellow-citizens, it was not thus your fathers won the mighty heritage of freedom called "our fatherland." In peril, smoke, and blood they beat the tyrant back, and gave to us the liberty we now enjoy. It seems but little now, compared to human needs, and if we felt the spirit which did animate our sires we should not sit in satisfaction and idly fold our hands while pallid labor pleads for justice, and state with church combines to cramp the human mind. Let us on every hilltop build the fires of liberty! Sons of rebels, you were not born for slaves!

MRS. H. S. LAKE.

Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Carpenter's Hall, in the city of Philadelphia, is one of the oldest associations of Pennsylvania, having been instituted forty years after the settlement in the province of William Penn, and at his death in 1736 he bequeathed his library to his fellow-members. At that time this hall became the great center of gatherings for the redress of grievances or the assertion of rights, and all the town meetings were held on the lawn in front or within its walls. A town meeting met in 1774, demanding the then convening Assembly to send a committee to Gov. Penn, whose reply was read to the effect that he saw no necessity for calling the Assembly together, upon which they appointed another committee to wait upon the speaker of the Assembly, demanding a positiv answer.

They then assembled at the Merchants' Coffee House on Second street near Walnut, and walked in a body to Carpenter's Hall, and resolved that all their transactions except such as they should resolve to publish be kept secret. They remained in session until their labors were completed, July 22, 1774.

June 18, 1776, this hall became the nation's birthplace, where the people met to deliberate upon the great question of the day, which on the 4th of July, 1776, declared the colonies free and independent. Paine enters and is introduced, and is the first to talk independence. The committee is horified at first with Paine's sentiments, for no one till now has breathed them.

When the Congress met, Mr. Cushing made a motion that it should be opened with prayer. It was opposed by Mr. Jay, of New York, and Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, because they were divided in religious sentiments, some Episcopalians, some Quakers, some Anabatists, some Presbyterians, and some Congregationalists, and could not join in the same kind of worship.

On Sunday, the 23d of June, 1776, a committee was appointed to draft a resolution declaring the senses of the conference with respect to the independence of the province from the crown of Great Britain, and to report next morning.

On Monday morning, the 24th of June, the committee brought in a draft of a declaration of independence for the colony of Pennsylvania, unanimously agreed to:

WHEREAS, George the Third, king of Great Britain, in violation of the principles of the British Constitution and of the laws of justice and humanity, hath by an accumulation of oppressions unparalleled in history excluded the inhabitants of this with the other colonies from his protection; and,

WHEREAS, He hath no regard to our numerous and dutiful petitions for a redress of our complicated grievances, but hath lately purchased foreign troops to assist in enslaving us, and hath excited the savages of this country to carry on a war against us, and also the negroes to imbrue their hands in the blood of their masters in a manner unpracticed by civilized nations, and hath lately insulted our calamities by declaring that he will show us no mercy until he hath reduced us, etc., etc.

This declaration has the sentiments of Thomas

Paine in his "Crisis" No. 1., written before Thomas Jefferson arrived in Philadelphia from Monticello. I hav copied this from the records now in Carpenter's Hall.

The name of Thomas Paine should be dear to every true American for the interest he took in the year 1776, and I hope it will be famed in the annals of history to the end of time for his establishing upon a lasting foundation the liberty of one quarter of the globe from oppression, and that it may be transmitted inviolate to our posterity.

The Reason Why.

132 WEST MAIN STREET,
ROCHESTER, N. Y., Feb. 11, 1881.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, PRES. N. L. L., Dear Sir: I am instructed by the Liberal League of Rochester to write to you and ask you why the League Notes are published in an obscure paper of irregular publication, one not extensivly read, instead of in a paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER that is very generally read among Liberals throughout the country; and also to request you to answer through THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav not your particular address, so I send this in care of the Investigator. Respectfully yours, A. E. TILDEN, Sec. R. L. L.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav received the above letter from an auxiliary Liberal League, and wish to say through your columns, in answer to it, that I hav always supposed THE TRUTH SEEKER has published all "League Notes." The Executiv Committee has ardently wished to reach people beyond the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but has not had the funds to buy copies of that able and voluminous journal for any extensiv gratuitous distribution. It must, if it would not run hopelessly in debt, either print the League Notes itself or employ some small journal publishing them to furnish extra copies. The latter was found to be the cheaper method.

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

What of State Rights?

Owing to the fact that the secessionists organized and fought against the Union under a banner whose chief motto was state rights, a great many people habitually confound the idea of state rights with the doctrins of secession and rebellion. This is really a great misfortune, for ours is a Government under a Constitution that is strictly a state rights document.

The centralizing consolidationist is as much in error as was the rebellious secessionist. Hamilton, who of all the men of the revolutionary war days was most in favor of a consolidated Union and opposed to extreme state rights doctrins, has left on record this expression, "The liberties of the people will survive or perish with the rights of the states."

The United States Supreme Court has declared that the rights of the states are as clearly defined by the Constitution, and are set off by boundaries as unmistakable, as the physical bounds that divide state from state.

[N. B.—Decision not yet overruled.]

The states hav sovereign and absolute rights. We select for illustration a subject that no one will dispute and all can comprehend. Every state is entitled to two U. S. Senators in Congress. Suppose that the great states of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, with their millions of population, should prevail on Congress to declare that Delaware, with its very few thousand inhabitants, shall not hav two senators. Here is a state right like many other similar state rights provided for by the Constitution. Had Delaware but one thousand people and New York a hundred millions, still, in the great law-making branch of this government, Delaware is the equal of New York, and one thousand people, equal to two hundred voters, hav as much power as a hundred million, equal to twenty million voters. Not all the power of this government could deprive these two hundred voters of this right, except by a force as unlawful as that by which the highway robber takes from his victim his plunder. Now the one who denies the state rights doctrin simply declares this right to two senators could be taken legally from Delaware. This is but one instance out of many that can be cited.

Here is the fact: thirteen states originally created a fourteenth power to do for them what was inconvenient and costly for each to do for itself. Instead of having thirteen ministers to each foreign power, thirteen different supreme governments, thirteen armies, supreme courts, etc., one would suffice for the whole; therefore let a fourteenth power be called into being as agent for all the others. The rights, powers, and duties of this agent, this fourteenth power, are set down in the document known as the Constitution. By agreement made at the time, other states or communities in the world might come into this agreement. The thirteen did not all at first come into it, but several remained out and came in one after another. They came in just as Canada, Mexico, Brazil, Japan, and Great Britain might yet enter it, to wit, as sovereign states, binding themselvs forever, under the terms of the Constitution, in one accord, to act as one nation before the whole outside world, this government called the United States being their agent.

Now would it not be monstrous if this agent shall by cautious, slow, crafty intrusions and usurpations become the absolute master of the whole, trampling the Constitution that created it under foot, and conquering by force or guile every state and binding all together into one adamantin consolidation?

It were easy to show that such a Union cannot last without war and military despotism. Power consolidated over a continent striven for by two parties must grow absolute. But power scattered, directed among forty or fifty small states, though it keep up a constant ferment and agitation, with occasional explosions and petty wars, tends more and more to equality and democracy.

This last statement is an axiom with historiographers. HOLT.

Sacred Scriptures Revised and Boiled Down.

EXORDIUM.—Liberally educated in all the theological isms of the past, and having made the sublime discovery that the sacred scriptures, graciously vouchsafed by the learned council of the "most high and mighty Prince James, king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland," is behind the age, we patriotically resolve our honorable self into an ecclesiastical council, and with much pious labor, care, and diligence bring forth the following:

OLD TESTAMENT.—Fond parents, wishing to establish a colony in a new country, clear a spot, plant it with trees, and make it like a garden. They put two of their children there, one of each persuasion—mere youths they were—and say to them: "You see we hav given you all the needfuls for horticultural purposes and an instrument of a thousand strings. When arrived at mature age, once in twenty-six moons, when you hav a telegram from us, with anthems of adoration and praise, you may touch the chords of that instrument and we will send you a little angel, and thus shall your number be increased until you become a great nation. But see that you make no unhallowed use of the instrument. This shall be the test of your integrity, your worthiness to receive the rich blessings we hav in store for you."

Wisdom is not a birthright inheritance. It is a plant of slow growth, sometimes through suffering.

Itching curiosity to try the chords of the mysterious instrument drew the youthful colonists into a youthful indiscretion. They see the blunder, they feel it. He tries to lay it on her. Bad chivalry that. She lays it to turtium quid.

They do hav an accession, and say, "We hav gotten a man from the Lord." The sequel demonstrates that they hav gotten him too far from the Lord entirely.

This youthful indiscretion demoralizes the colony, and now the question arises, How shall humanity be cleaned up? the church, the Rev., the clergy be cleaned up?

NEW TESTAMENT.—Holy eternal parents plant a second colony like unto the first; same outfit, just this slight variation in the instructions: "The use, the sole and only use, of the harp of a thousand strings is to be let alone, not meddled with, manner nor shape. This is the test of your aspiration and self-control, your fitness for the mansions of our eternal brightness."

This second enterprise is a success. Now are the "new heavens," so long existing in prophecy only, being actualized in this our day.

The "new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness," is forthcoming. It will furnish better material for the "new heavens" than is now lying about loose.

In the "new earth" children can be born in good shape, physically and mentally, no prenatal nor subsequent insult nor abuse; no lack of the affections.

PERORATION.—To all who make scriptures, expecting others to read, we respectfully suggest: Wait till you are sure you hav an idea, an idea that will interest somebody besides your own dear self. When sure you hav an idea, put that idea in the fewest possible words; put the words together mechanically in pursuance of the laws of language. Let your sentences be short; don't send your reader away back to hunt for your nominativ or antecedent.

In this fast age, with such deluge of would-be reading matter, if writers would hav readers, they must write not wholly for their own edification. Nothing personal intended. PRENTISS.

P. S.—TRUTH SEEKER types are set with peerless fidelity. Amen. P.

Babcock Ghost Book.

MR. BENNETT: How dare you print such an awful book as that book on ghosts? I've read it, and would hav thrown it in the fire if it hadn't been borrowed. Tar and feathers are too good for a man that will print such an awful book of lies! lies! lies! But Mr. Bennett, if you won't print any more our society of Christian women will pray for you. Babcock keeps selling them and says it is the best book he ever wrote or saw, and that every word is true. Oh, oh, what a liar! He calls it "The Ghost of St. Johns," and says it overshadowed a girl one time. It's a lie, and you ought to know it is so, now; but if you won't print any more of them we'll pray for you. Now please be good, and remember that God might strike you with lightning. Yours for the love of Jesus. MISS SUSAN TUTTLE.

A Word to Liberal Liberals.

DEAR FRIENDS: The old veteran Freethinker, Daniel Tuttle, of Poplar, Crawford county, Ohio, has sent me some of his Divinity Physicians, which I would like to sell for him. These papers, though printed nearly thirty years ago, are as bold and outspoken as our darling TRUTH SEEKER, and are chock full of fire, vim, and energy. They are unique, sharp, and witty. Printed when such utterances were far more damaging to the reputation and business prospects of the speaker than they now are, they are worth preserving as sacred mementos of the brave pioneer who blazed a way for our beloved papers to pleasantly travel in.

Friend Tuttle and his wife are very old and rheumatic. He can barely hobble from his chair to the bed, and I hope all who can will send ten cents or more for a copy or two of his Physician, so that I may, ere long, gladden his heart with a nice little sum of "the needful."

Yours expectantly, ELMINA D. SLENKER.
Snowville, Va.

Old Jupiter.

Under the above heading, in your issue of Jan. 29, 1881, D. Higbee, M. D., of Burton, Mich., informs us that "Pike's Peak and Mt. Walker hav recently burst forth in volcanic flames." The above information greatly surprised me, and were I not living daily almost in sight of Pike's Peak I might possibly hav believed it.

In justice to the old Peak, who, since 1805, when discovered by Lieutenant Pike, and ascended by Dr. James, has borne an enviable reputation for peace and sobriety, as he has for millions of years, allowing the rocks to testify, I feel it my duty to correct Dr. Higbee's statement in regard to the oldest known and fourth highest peak in the state, being 14,336 feet above sea level. There are few or no clear evidences of a volcanic origin to be found in any of the mountains of Colorado. As to Mt. Walker, it was not given in the geographies when I went to school, and I cannot help suspecting he means Mt. Baker in Washington Ter., which all know is now in a state of eruption. I think Dr. Higbee equally in error when he says in speaking of Prof. Tice's weather forecasts, "These weather predictions are based on astronomical facts and are as positiv and certain as the revolution of planets," etc. It must be admitted that some of Prof. Tice's predictions prove true, but far less, I think, than those of Prof. Richard Mansill, of Rock Island, Ill., whose theory is that the disturbing influence of the perihelion and aphelion passages of the planets and the longitudinal conjunction of these bodies is the true natural base and cause of our worst meteoric agitations. I would ask Dr. Higbee to compare the two and report next year, and I will do the same. Yours for correction,

Denver, Col., Feb. 11th. IRA A. SCOTT.

Freedom Above All Things Else.

Our esteemed friend and co-worker, J. S. Verity, in the Investigator, truly says:

"We hav two seceding organizations from the League on account of favoring repeal of Comstock's laws—one by Abbot & Co., at Syracuse, and the other by Ingersoll & Co., at Chicago. It is evident from this that there is a difference of opinion among Liberals on this question; but if offense come of our difference of opinion, it is better that the offense come than that the truth should be concealed. What is the League good for if it can't defend free speech? Shall we follow the example of Green, back down and turn around, and thus acknowledge that Comstock and Abbot are right, that free speech and free mails are wrong? Let us go for liberty first and organization second. In a Christian government, Infidels hav no rights that Christians are bound to respect! They hav organized a society for the suppression of vice, meaning thereby the suppression of free thought and free speech, when exercised by Infidels, Atheists, Spiritualists, Freelovers, and Liberals. Shall we allow the churches to tell us what is moral and what is immoral, what is decent and what is obscene? We might as well ask them to tell us what is true in religion. They sent Abner Kneeland to prison for blasphemy for denying the existence of their imaginary God, Heywood to prison for circulating what they call an immoral and obscene book. What difference does it make to Liberals whether they call it blasphemy or obscenity? It is persecution, oppression, tyranny, all the same. It is the denial of man's most sacred right—the right of free speech; yet these inconsistent tyrant are themselvs circulating the Bible, a book far more obscene than the book proscribed."

FOR good reading and much valuable information send for Bradlaugh's "Secular Almanac." 25 cents.

Letters from Friends.

EUREKA, Wis., Feb. 11, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I see much in your paper of late about your taking a trip around the world. But it seems to me that before much is said or done in that direction a certain little woman should be consulted and see what she says about it. It is true that she has dispensed with your society a good deal for the last two years, and she may hav got so used to it that she can get along very well without you. If so, all right; go ahead. With her consent, you may count on me for five dollars; also my brother J. M. authorizes me to pledge him for a "V." Yours truly,

E. B. ROUNDS.

MISTHER EDITOR: I hav read in your cowardly paper letthers from English, Dutch, and nagers, but niver before hav I heard of an Irishman. I am an intiligent gintleman, and I am a goin' to rason ye out of bein' aginst God.

In the first place, what d'ye 'spose that God thinks of yees that ye don't love him? Faith, now Ise bringin' some of yees to the pint. D'ye bleave there iver was a Captin-Gineral George Washington of Ameriky? Then, faith and bedad, if ye do you must bleave that Christ did liv and that God did begit him. By the holy horrors of Gotham, ye can niver stand up under such argumentation as this.

Be jabbers, if I had $5 you would find it inclosed for the purpose of sendin' you around the the world to the divil and gone. Yes, I would giv my whole farm if I had one to git ye away from that TRUTH SEEKER. Then might all the bloody murther accidents befall ye for all I'd care, "goat" that ye are.

TIMOTHY MCFLAERTY.

P.S.—By me soul, the Holy Ghost has been workin' on me all the time. I forgot to say that I am helpin' God along in his business.

T. MCFLAERTY, GOD & Co.

GALENA, ILL., Jan. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription ran out Jan. 1st, and I see you purpose a trip around the world. I think it a good thing, and you must put me down for $5. for I am well pleased with your last book of travel. Send me a postal card when you will be ready, and I will send you a check on New York for $8, three for the paper and the remainder for the books.

W. ENNOR.

ROCHESTER, MICH., Feb. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please count me in for $5 for the circumnavigation of the planet, and let me hav a book comprehending what a pair of Infidel eyes hav seen by the way. Perhaps a true statement in regard to those old, moss-back, oriental regions was never more needed than just about the present time. Money forthgoing when called for. Yours for life,

C. H. GREENE.

PICTURE ROCKS, PA., Feb. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I want you to add my name to the list for your trip around the world. Will send you $5 when you think you hav enough names to warrant you in the undertaking. I hav read some of your letters of travel in Europe. I consider them just grand.

Yours for more light, IRA SMITH.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Feb. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose when you look over your list of delinquents you think it hard for professed Liberals to keep you out of your pay so long, but I believe the majority feel as bad about it as you do. I handle a good deal of money in the course of a year and hav a good many ways for it, and hav to wait till every one's turn comes around, but yours is sure to come around as long as you print THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can't do without it as long as I can get the money to pay for it, so you can reckon on me as a life subscriber. I hav been reading about your trip around the world. I want you to go, although I shall worry about you all the time you are gone, as every Liberal will. It is a long and perilous journey. We want you to liv a half century at least to giv these Christian bigots h—l. I think by that time they will be wiped out. You can reckon on me for $5, so notify me when the time comes.

F. GRANT.

BASCO, ILL., Jan. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Take my name on your list for $5 for the coming book of your travels around the world if you hav names enough to enable you to go.

Fraternally, JOHN DIDIER.

OWEN SOUND, ONT., CAN., Jan. 28, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: It is not often I trouble you in this way, therefore I take the liberty to address a few remarks for THE TRUTH SEEKER, my idol. In the first place I want to thank Mr. Coleman for the idea of sending you around the world in search of truth. We want something we can rely on. We can't take Christian history for truth, for a Rev. Dr. Manning asserts in effect that if history won't teach what the church wants it to teach it must be made to teach it. That's splendid, but so it is.

Now you can put me down for a "V" for that trip, to be paid in when called upon. I want those volumes for my children to read when they grow big enough to read. But should this old globe take a tumble this year, we won't get them, won't need them, nor the five dollars either, so there won't be any loss.

Now, Liberals, come forward. This is the year of grace. So let us reap a good harvest out of the fulness of D. M. Bennett's brain. Do not miss the chance. You may never hav such an opportunity again.

Your letters from abroad were very interesting, and it seemed, when reading them, as if I were actually with you and seeing things with my own eyes, your accounts were so vivid.

I like the new dress much better than the old, and the paper comes full of truth and sparkling thought from beginning to end.

T. B. Wakeman's lessons are very instructiv, and Mr. Chainey on "The Clergy" was simply grand. I believe every word he uttered is truth. I sometimes go to church myself, and the thought runs through my cranium when I see the dominie in the pulpit, What great and mighty truth will he propound to-day? But alas! When he gets wound up and set going I can hear the same old pass-words I heard years ago when I belonged to the craft. The same tone, the same appeal to the heart and pocket, and the same talk about the slothfulness of Christians, and Jesus Christ and him crucified, and the joy and peace Christians enjoy.

When will they cease dealing out such slop at these gospel shops? I hope to liv to see the day when people will hav more respect for themselvs than to listen to such nonsense.

"We want no counsel from the priest,
No bishop's crook or gown;
No sanctimonious righteousness,
No curse, or godly frown."

Fraternally thine, A. F. THOMSON.

CARBONDALE, KAN., Jan. 23, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Count me one that will giv $5 to send you around the world on the terms you offer. And now right here allow me to suggest that the title of the book be so chosen that canvassers can avoid the general prejudice against Infidel works. While that course will not deter any friend from subscribing for the book, it will put our Liberal literature in the hands of many prejudiced Christians.

Yours for truth, W. BROWN.

JORDAN VALLEY, OR., Jan. 29, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Put me down as one of the three hundred to giv five dollars for your trip around the world. Since I read your letters from Europe I consider the money will be well invested.

I am sixteen years of age, and I hav read your paper for nearly two years. I think it is the best Liberal paper in the world, and I hope three hundred of its subscribers will decide to send you five dollars each for your trip, and to show Comstock & Co. what the Infidels can do.

Respectfully yours, WM. R. KING.

HICKORY GROVE, KY., Jan. 22, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I see by your issue of January 1st there are several subscribing to the fund to send you around the world; and as I am a boy sixteen years of age, and wish to learn something of the history of the world, I hav concluded to send you $5 if you make the trip. Your money will be ready when desired. I am inclined to cling to the Liberals, and will do anything in my power to uphold them. Yours truly, C. H. MOORE.

GENESEO, ILL., Feb. 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I will pledge myself to take a copy of the book you may write on the tour you propose to make around the word, but I am not in a financial way to advance the money.

I hav read the writings of ministers who hav traveled in Palestine and the Holy Land, but their accounts did not exactly suit me. I once heard a lecturer, a minister of the gospel, who had been in the Holy Land, explain how Samson of the Bible legend could catch so many foxes in one night. He said there were a great many foxes there now, and all one would hav to do would be to hang up a piece of meat in the yard that surrounds the house and the foxes would come in the yard after the meat. When there was a sufficient number in just close the gate and there you had them like so many sheep.

You see it is a nice story for Sunday-school children to believe, but it never would "wash" with me.

If you do make the trip around the world, do not omit visiting the Sandwich Islands, and let us know just how the Christianizing influence obliterated the original inhabitants or nearly so. There is a chance to make a point that will tell against the foes of liberty, the Christians. M. M. ALLEN.

DENVER, IOWA, Feb. 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I don't wonder so many are calling out for you to go "around the world." They remember your letters from Europe. But you hav never yet been paid for all the outlay and toil they cost you. I fear it may be thus in your circumnavigation project. You hav arrived at a point in which perhaps prudence would require that you lay aside a little of your honest earnings for a coming wet day. We, your friends, can benefit you far more pecuniarily by buying $5.00 worth of those many books already published than by inducing you to go to great expense and trouble to publish another for $5.00, and perhaps lose by it. I don't want you to go. We need you here, and will need you still more in the future. When you are on the point of embarking, if I can raise the amount, I will giv you $5 not to go. When thunder-storms arise, and great men become little by forsaking their principles, to which they never return, we need such spirits as you, Wakeman, Pillsbury, Leland, Wright, and Lucy Colman, that the Liberal ship shall ride steadily on her way.

Our Paine celebration was a grand success. About eight hundred were in attendance at the Opera House in Waverly. We were disappointed in speakers from abroad, but everything passsd off very pleasantly, the dance continuing till about 2 o'clock Sunday morning. Yours for the right,

M. FARRINGTON.

ALTOONA, PA., Feb. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The 144th birthday of the author-hero, Thomas Paine, is past and gone. In this bigoted orthodox city there are but few who hav the manhood to praise his name; but few who hav the courage to do him honor.

There are some persons here who call themselvs Freethinkers, but most of them, being in business, are afraid to speak their honest thought. But we hav a few that dare to speak out boldly and freely and defy the teachings of the church and the warnings of hell-fire-and-brimstone preachers.

On the evening of Jan. 29th a few of us met at a private house to celebrate the birthday and venerate the memory of him who said, "The world is my country, to do good my religion."

The time was spent very pleasantly, and upon returning to our homes and partaking of "nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," we awoke without seeing ghosts, hobgoblins, giants, and such like as are pictured in the "Pilgrim's Progress," whose author sits in heaven with the holy angels and looks down upon the form of Thomas Paine roasting in hell for writing the "Age of Reason," a book that a certain bishop said made skeptics by the thousand. In this city the church is very powerful. Every Sabbath morning seventeen clergyman endeavor to teach a weary people how to die while they ought to teach them how to liv. They warn the Freethinkers of their approaching fate unless they repent, and now and then endeavor to tell the people that Col. Ingersoll's Infidelity is weakening because he shed tears of sorrow at the grave of his loving brother. A few weeks ago a Lutheran preacher delivered a sermon to a large congregation, his subject being, "The Dying Saint and the Dying Sinner," and it is said that there was not a person but that shed tears in all that vast assemblage. He dwelt chiefly upon the agonies of hell and the happiness of heaven, of the death-bed of the sinner and the death-bed of the saint. What cruel ideas those are to impress upon the minds of little children! What terrors they must bring to the ignorant and credulous! Let us then as Freethinkers be free to utter our honest convictions, be free to stand firm upon the eternal rock of truth. Christianity must fall. Its foundations are giving way already. Its idols are tumbling to the ground. Let Infidelity advance. It is the lighthouse to the wrecked and ruined mariners of superstition. It is the foe of orthodoxy, but the friend of man. It was the guiding star of hope to Voltaire, the glittering sword of reason to Thomas Paine. It was the forerunner of liberty in the past, the messenger of truth at the present, and the only road to happiness in the future.

M. T. BURNS.

BOZEMAN, M. T., Jan. 26, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I met with another unghostly emblem of inspiration the other day in the shape of a new subscriber. I say "unghostly" because my effort was not inspired by a ghost or any of the family. I say "inspiration" for the reason that it was through a sense of duty that the effort was made. You will receive the mite, not alone as an evidence of appreciation, but also an indication of my faith that the real essential to the success of your battle against the hosts of superstition depends on aid of this character.

It is apparent to every one at this age that the printing-press is a host within itself. Yet for necessary vitality it must hav pecuniary aid in the shape of punctually-paid patronage. When a religious paper goes down we conjecture that there is an indication of absence of patronage, a falling off of membership, a decline of power, the powder wet and a "battery spiked." Therefore I say let us all come to the front and make our press a monument to our cause. There is no better way of showing our strength and thereby influencing the tone of the entire secular press of our country.

I like much to read the many interesting and instructiv communications to your paper. And while those of a congratulatory character are well enongh, I must confess that to me it would seem that their intrinsic excellence might hav been greatly augmented had they contained the name of some new subscriber and the much-needed three dollars. But I presume circumstances rendered it impossible, therefore contentment prevails. My motto is, Material, practical, substantial, and permanent aid. This is what you need, what you want, and what you should hav. It is marrow, bone, and muscle.

I hav a foreboding that there is too much borrowing and loaning THE TRUTH SEEKER. And to a poor Western mortal it seems much like cheating the editor, like receiving "cities for which we labored not." The reason I speak of it is that I see much of it done here, and apprehend that it is done elsewhere. In some localities one subscriber furnishes the paper for the neighborhood. This givs the editor no show, or at least a slender one. And I can't conceive that it is morally right. If this territory is a criterion for the whole country, no doubt you hav from five to ten regular readers to each subscriber. To me this seems like a starving-out process. At the same time policy would dictate that it should be loaned judiciously, as this would induce subscription,

Please don't think that I wish to dictate. What I hav seen here seems so much like thoughtless injustice to you that I could not withhold dropping a word or two by way of suggestion that we do not borrow quite so much, support our paper better, and prove our faith by our works.

Therefore please find inclosed $3 for this new subscriber. As I reside fourteen miles from the post-office, I indulge in the hope that I may find more subscribers before reaching it. We are having orthodox weather now, which means severe. The thermometer stood 38 below zero this morning.

Truly yours, THOS. BURK.

P. S.—As I expected, on my way here to the post-office I collected money for three other new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. T. B.

[We thank our friend for his effort in behalf of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is entirely correct in his views about the necessity for material aid to keep it running. For this purpose a hundred dollars in money will go much farther in paying expenses than a thousand dollars in sympathy. He is quite correct, too, in thinking that every reader of the paper ought to be willing to pay for it. It is no advantage to any publisher for thousands to read his paper without helping to keep it up. Deadheads make poor truth seekers. Every person who reads it regularly ought to feel morally bound to help pay its expenses.—ED. T. S.]

LIBERTY, KAN., Jan. 31, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: You and I are in the minority on the drink question, as all except F. J. Emary pitched into you because you took a glass of wine. I wish to tell you that you are not alone, even though the other side does all the talking. I would like to ask those who are throwing stones if they are perfect themselvs. Don't they drink strong tea or coffee, which, I am told by medical men, are nearly if not quite as bad as wine and beer, or perhaps use tobacco till they are as dry as a nutmeg? M. L. Bonnel says she believes "we are each one our brother's keeper." So doubtless did the church when she tortured and burnt the heretics that they might not lead other souls to hell.

Now I protest against any one governing my stomach, and I do not claim any right to tell any one what he shall eat or drink, or what he shall not. I know that this is done. It has just been done in this state by a little more than half telling the lesser half that they cannot buy or sell or make.

Because some make drunkards of themselvs, therefore no one shall hav any kind of liquors. Would it not be about as reasonable to prohibit the manufacture and sale of powder, laudanum, poison, etc., because some people kill themselvs with these things? I am told we average eighty suicides per day in the United States. Allowing that alcohol is the greatest curse, when you hav done away with that, will not something else be the greatest curse then? Then the question is, Where are you going to stop?

Slusser says alcohol is a poison, and that human experience has so demonstrated. Then in case of the bite of a rattlesnake, does it take one poison to cure another? Now if poison could cure poison, how is it that whisky is about the only thing known that will cure the bite of a poisonous snake? I wonder if some of you who are so willing to prevent the sale of whisky would not change your mind just a little if you were bitten by a snake and a friend had rode thirty miles to the nearest town where whisky could be had and you were told that it was against the law to sell it and the doctor could do nothing for you without it!

I hav known just such an occurrence right here. A man got some whisky from another who did not obey fanatics, but not in time to save his life.

What I object to is that these people are trying to compel total abstinence. It may be better to abstain, then to try to convince us of the fact; but when you try to force us, a thing which we believe you hav no right to do, we rebel.

As whisky is poison, and is made from grain, is not the grain poison? If it is turned to poison in the act of fermentation, does it get the poison from the air? If not, where does it get it?

People can be fanatic on other subjects besides religion. No one must prevent them from thinking, but they seem perfectly willing to govern other stomachs. I believe education is desirable, but I do not believe in forcing it down any one's throat. I know that is where I differ with a great many; in fact, I am in favor of freedom in more than religion.

Yours for freedom, J. E. HOLMES.

NEWBURY, MASS., Feb. 3, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I tender you all the congratulations you hav received on your escape from the clutches of bigotry, and the execrations heaped upon your persecutors I would multiply ten thousand times.

Your reception in Europe was the fitting complement of the indignities you received here at the hands of the church. Most respectfully,

NATHANIEL LITTLE, Jr.

SOLEBURY, PA., Dec. 25, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Permit me, if you please, again to ventilate some of my desultory thoughts in your highly valuable paper.

In as few words as possible,
I'll try the truth to hit,
As brevity of speech I hold
To be the soul of wit.
May Liberals all united be,
And may their numbers swell
To banish priestly rule,
Their devil, and their hell.

May common sense be held at par,
To settle wayward strife,
And be to all the Bethlehem star,
The guiding star of life;
May all rejoice upon their way
The babe of truth to find,
Cradled in the soul of man,
Of man's immortal mind.

May all be free to utter thoughts
In their peculiar way,
And not be guided by the priests,
Who only preach for pay;
Their waning light is fading
Upon the scroll of time,
As science rears its lofty head
In every earthly clime.

Their stale theology must die,
Be buried with the past,
As greater light is coming,
To set them all aghast.
I take no credit to myself,
As being wise or good,
I only state impressiv views,
As they impress I should.

My theoretic theorem of all nature broad,
And one almighty, universal Science-God,
I will elucidate in language best I can,
To meet conception in the mind of man.
I've studied deep the root of all to find
The greatest puzzle to the human mind,
That which ever did exist in endless time,
The mighty God of all, the Great Sublime!

The prime original cause of all,
Diversity combined,
The all of all of matter,
And all of all of mind
Is one almighty force or power,
Susceptible of change,
From one condition to another,
So wonderful and strange,

All things are formed from the unseen,
The fountain source of all,
Of all the things that may be seen,
However great or small.
Men may doubt it as they will,
But science wields the sway,
To prove that all of all is matter,
Or power, I would say!

John J. Woodward, in his "Analysis of the Human Mind," commences thus: "Throughout the entire realm of nature the naturalist finds but one substance existing under a variety of forms, diverse modifications or modes of existence, and that substance or entity is matter; and however subtle, ramified, imperceptible, or invisible it is, yet ever subject to certain laws, though its conditions are sometimes such as to be known by its effects only."

Here the naturalist finds an end.
He only sees the flower.
He fails to grasp the all of all—
Ethereous substance power.
If any think my views are wrong,
Please show me where and how.
Before the truth I humbly stand,
Prepared to make my bow.

CRUMBS OF THOUGHT.

Crumbs of thought that come unsought,
Like waves upon the sea,
And dash with fury on the shore,
Determined to be free.
Ideal thoughts, when clothed in words,
Resemble nuts, I trow—
Their outer covering must be pierced
Their inner truth to know.
A question came to me of late,
Which I will answer here
In a kind of friendly, jovial way,
In languague plain and clear.

Ques.—What period of mundane life is the most enjoyably happy?

Ans.—I would say, Let the birds of the air expound the lesson. When they choose their mates and build their nests, may we not reasonably conclude then to be the most enjoyably happy period of their lives? So also with mankind.

When two loving souls unite,
In holy wedlock bound,
No happier period of their lives
On earth is ever found.
Then all the faculties of soul
In harmony do blend
To find congenial, loving mate,
A more than common friend.
Old maids and bachelors may doubt
This answer being true,
But they're not proper judges
Of what they never knew. E. W. A.

DENVER, COL., Feb. 2. 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Jan. 29, 1881, John S. Walker, in a long, labored, say-nothing article, attempts to sum up what he meant to hav said as follows, "I lay it down that reason and science prove that there can be no annihilation of any real being or actual entity." After making this positiv assertion he turns squarely around in the next sentence and says that death annihilates all. Will Mr. Walker try and harmonize his thoughts before he throws them at a thinking public?

Yours truly, HUGO PREYER.

CAMBRIA MILLS, MICH., Jan. 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I send you one dollar to renew my subscription to your paper. I would like to send you more, but I am not able. I am a life-subscriber, and I am seventy-two years old. I had rather go with one meal a day than do without the paper. HUGH VAN WERT.

ROCK FALLS, ILL., Feb, 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see you make a favorable notice of Searle's "Old and New," printed in Morrison in this county. I hav been acquainted with Mr. Searle for many years, and know him to be a man with a good soul, but like most of the conscientious reformers, is not appreciated. He is a vigorous writer, either in poetry or prose. He has not much of this world's goods. Persecution took from him a farm. He ever since has been connected with different reformatory papers. I commend him to the patronage of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Take his paper a year at fifty cents. You will not regret it.

Yours, W. E. LUKENS.

SPRING CITY, PA., Feb. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We had quite an excitement here the other day. One of our honorable, esteemed citizens of this place had the misfortune to lose his wife, who passed to the spirit world. During the excitement and preparation for burial one of our young lady Methodist converts who had access to the house went through the bureau and stole the dead woman's wedding ring, seven dollars in gold and silver, and a new coat valued at $15. Now this lamb of Jesus is bound to appear at court. Is not that splendid for one of God's children who would not read THE TRUTH SEEKER?

Your well wisher, THOMAS WRIGHT.

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: We are told that there is rejoicing in heaven over the conversion of one sinner. Be that as it may, I am happy to herein send you the name of a new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, a gentleman of thought, culture, ability, and influence. About a year or more ago he chanced to meet the pioneer, Allen Noe, and to see a number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the leaven of conversion has wrought the "change of heart." He is a Liberalist now, not only in sentiment, but with purse; he handed me three gold dollars to forward you as his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. You may depend upon us as "seed sowers," for after reading the papers we send them on their mission, and hope you, with us, may reap the harvest.

Since living in this city I hav often attended church, and must say I am thoroughly disgusted with the nothingness, the dry husks and sightless skeletons with which the mass are fed from the pulpit. We are astonished that educated, cultured men can stand in the pulpit and sustain their enthusiasm with such senseless trash. Rev. Chainey knows, and he says they "don't believe it themselvs." Through all their assumed zeal we see the ghost of a salary, yellow-legged chickens, popularity, and soft, white hands.

Loving the truth most, GRACE L. PARKHURST.

NORTH YAMHILL, OR., Jan. 10, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Dear old martyr for the cause of right, I see by the paper that you are home again. I hope you had a merry Christmas among your many friends, and I wish you a happy New Year.

I hav very much enjoyed reading your very interesting letters from Europe. They are very interesting to one like me, living away up in the mountains of the Coast Range in Oregon.

I liv ten miles from North Yamhill, on the road leading from the Willamette Valley over to the coast at Tillamook, and still the paper finds me regularly every week. We keep an accommodation house for travelers and pleasure-seekers. The mail stops here. If in your next travels you should make our coast a visit, come and stop a week with me and I will show you trees from my door 250 to 300 feet high, and I will take you out on an elk hunt and toughen the muscles of your legs, and giv you the best water to drink, and the best air to breathe, you ever had. Fruits in Oregon are very plenty. There are thousands of bushels of apples, pears, and plums going to waste every year in the valley of the Willamette. We hav only been here from grasshopper Kansas two years. We like it here very much.

I hav calculated to spend a week canvassing for the paper this winter; but owing to the pressure of business, I am afraid I shall hav to giv it up. I will send you a list of names of Freethinkers that do not take your paper. Yours, G. W. SMITH.

Balkis, Queen of Sheba, and Solomon.

BY ALHAZA.

Kneel not, bright Balkis, 'tis I that must worship.
Who shall inhale the rich balm of thy breath!
Dark-eyed gazelle, every glance doth enrich me,
Charm me, with spells that are sweeter than death.

Wild mountain roe, let me drink of thy beauty;
Thou hast rich spices and gold from the mine;
Lov'st thou no more thy pale gems from the ocean,
Lioness, bounding from bowers like thine!

Say, dost thou pity the heart that is breaking?
Bring'st thou from Yemen one hope or one song
Breathing of faith or of love that is holy?
Lean on my bosom and pour it along.

Brings't thou a draught from a cool, sparkling fountain,
A haven of rest in the sand's burning sea?
Sad amid joy, at a feast I am starving;
Bathe my wan lips and bring calmness to me.

I hav all riches and wisdom and splendor,
Sobbing alone 'neath the wild midnight sky.
Is there a heart that will love me forever,
And kiss from my lips the last breath when I die?

Paradise bird, thou hast notes that can ravish
Hearts that are sinking in misery's flood;
Say, canst thou charm the foul stain from this purple,
Dyed in an ocean of madness and blood?

Oh, what are greatness and glory and power,
Trembling in misery, shivering with fears?
Lord of the beggar, the outcast, the homeless,
Monarch of poverty, ruin, and tears.

The Grapevine and Its Fruit.

BY ELLA A. BACON.

Beneath my window the grapevine grows,
Twining its tendrils here and there;
Through its crooked branches the sap that flows
Bursts forth in young shoots green and flowers fair.

Then the blossom and the young green fruit
Hang in tiny clusters from the vine;
But I know that their flavor will not suit
Till their hearts shall glow like the ruby wine.

So I leave them upon the straggling bough,
Drinking the sunshine, the dew, and air,
Till through each cluster true nature's plow
Shall work its wonderful mission there.

But some will pluck ere the fruit is ripe,
And, tasting its acid, will frown and say,
"This fruit is evil, and we will wipe
Its existence out of the world to-day."

But wisdom whispers: "Be wise and wait,
The fruit now so acid will sweeter grow,
And through its clusters the purple light
Shall borrow its hues from the sunset glow.

"Then as ye pluck from the laden vine,
Lifting its clusters one by one,
Tasting the pure, unfermented wine,
Whose press was the genial, smiling sun,

"You will wisely conclude that nature's way
Was the very best. Through the crooked vine,
Through the sour fruit that you plucked that day,
The sap has turned into sweetest wine."

Hav you caught the thought that my rhyme contains,
That truths through crooked channels flow;
And oft we fail to perceive their light,
But at last we catch their fire and glow?

Ah! then do they prove a nectar sweet,
Which we with our eager souls do grasp;
For they help to make our lives complete
And hold us firm in their loving clasp.

Persevere.

Spite of failure, spite of danger,
Persevere.
To all doubts and fears a stranger,
Persevere.
When a noble course beginning,
Doubting, wavering is but sinning;
If success you would be winning,

Bright the future flows toward you,
Your own deeds will yet reward you;
Let not hate nor fear retard you,

The Bottled Fly.

BY CHARLES BRADLEY.

My son, giv me thy heart. —Old Words.

Look on me with thy large brown eyes,
Philip, my king, for round thee the purple glory lies
Of babyhood's royal dignities;
Lay on my neck thy little hand
With love's invisible scepter laden.
Dinah Maria Muloch.

I'll sing you a song of a little word,
As mighty little as ever you heard;
The song of a fly, not eat by a bird,
For' twas in a bottle the death occurred
Of this poor Fly.

Up the bottle and down again,
With many a buzz of fear and pain,
The cry of nature made in vain,
For oh, he can't get out again—
The bottled Fly.

Never go where 'tis a sin;
Nothing pays that you can win.
The saddest cry that's ever been
Is the cry, "I can't get out again!"
Of the Bottled Fly.

Music of the summer air,
Home in every garden fair,
Oh, why in the world did he crawl in there
To make himself a bottled despair?
The poor Fly!

Oh, go not where 'tis a sin!
Nothing pays that you can win.
The saddest song that's ever been
Is the cry, "I can't get out again!"
Of the Bottled Fly.

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Proposition.

I am prepared and will send to any one address, direct from my office, one sheet of "Blackfoot's" Magnetized Paper, postage paid, every week for one month for forty cents; two months for seventy cents; three months for one dollar. Address, with amount inclosed, James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom st., Philadelphia, Pa.

The mines of this company, four in number, are situated near Crosson, on the line of the Denver & South Park Railroad, and but 48 miles from Denver. This camp is considered one of the best in the state, and its easy access certainly commends it to the favorable consideration of the public. The Stonewall Mining Company is organized under the laws of Colorado, and has an authorized capital of $1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of ten dollars each, and are placed on the market for the present at two dollars per share, or a discount of eight dollars from the face value, thus enabling those who purchase at once to derive the benefit not only of dividends, but also from the advance in the price of stock, which will soon be made

The mines of the Stonewall Mining Company are all true fissures, and as a guarantee that they are worthy of confidence, samples of ore will be sent to any one who will send ten cents to the Secretary to pay postage, or to any one visiting the office of the company samples will cheerfully be given. Write at once for prospectus.

Your Case Is Curable!

DOCTOR FELLOWS

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 Illustrations, by Dr. R. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

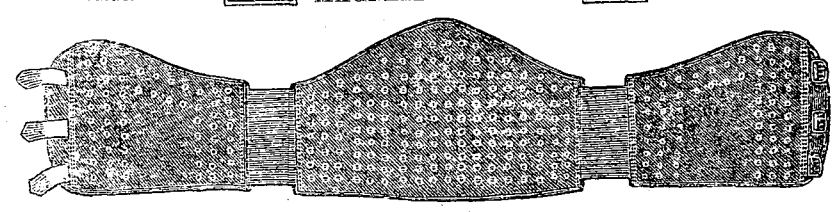
The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere pads or plasters which lose their efficacy in a few weeks, but are so scientifically constructed that they WILL LAST FOR TWENTY YEARS, and can be worn by different members of the same family from time to time.

Lung Invigorator.



Chest Protector.

Anklet.

Knee Cap.

Shoulder Belt.

In-Soles.

Sciatica and Lumbago Belt.

DESCRIPTION OF ABOVE GARMENTS.

Each Eylet is a galvanic cell attached to a series of powerful magnets. They are light as ordinary garments, and produce a soothing yet exhilirating effect upon the system, without causing shocks or sores, as in electric belts or galvanic chains.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are the Despair of Physicians, and the Annihilation of Quack Nostrums and Legalized Quackery. Thousands of persons are being constantly hurried on to Apoplexy and Paralysis by the use of Cephalic Snuffs and Washes. Catarrh can be readily cured without any of these nostrums.

THE "WILSONIA" CORSET AND MAGNETIC BELT

For Ladies and Gentlemen will cure Asthma, Catarrh, Loss of Energy, Nervous Debility, Bleeding at the Lungs, Kidney Disease, Tumors, Rheumatism, Gout, Paralysis, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, and every form of Female Weakness.

SEND FOR PRICE LIST Containing THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere plasters which become useless after a few weeks' wear, but they retain their curativ powers for twenty years, and can be worn by any member of the same family from time to time.

Persons who read this notice may wonder that I had not advertised my discovery before. The fact is, I determined when I arrived in America not to publicly advertise until I had five hundred patients in one city, to whom I could refer as evidence. I hav now over one thousand persons in the city of Brooklyn ready to testify that my galvano-magnetic belts will remove and cure every malady known to man, except a rotten lung, and even where the lungs hav begun to decay, my appliances will arrest the decay and heal them.

Here in the city of Brooklyn the paralyzed hav been restored; patients suffering from inflammatory rheumatism hav been taken off their crutches; nerve maladies, bearing on mania, hav been completely cured; martyrs to varicose veins, whose legs hav been bound in elastic stockings for twenty years, hav cut away their bandages, and are now as free from varicose veins as the healthiest person living; children who had never walked from birth up to three, eight, and twelve years of age, are now walking about as other children. In short, the cures effected by my appliances seem so miraculous that the above statements sound like an Arabian Night's tale. Nevertheless, these facts can all be substantiated, and my open letter to the physicians and the Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn must convince the most incredulous that my invention is the most wonderful on record.

My offer of five thousand dollars to the physicians and Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn is still open, and will continue so to be for six months.

I am prepared to go into the hospitals and will only take their incurable cases, suffering from paralysis, locomotor, ataxia, inflammatory and chronic rheumatism, congestion of the kidneys, pleuro-pneumonia, or any disease their medicins hav failed to reach—less an absolutely decayed lung.

If the citizens of Brooklyn continue to suffer from any of the above maladies, they hav themselvs to blame.

The cost of my appliances, though seemingly expensiv, is one hundred times cheaper than the present method of purchasing physicians' prescriptions and paying for their drugs.

Send to me for price lists and testimonials, and make full inquiries of those who hav been cured, before you waste your time in calling upon me.

I court the fullest scrutiny, and prefer not selling you goods until you hav inquired of those who hav been cured.

GOLD For Every Determined Man or Woman. YOUNG'S GREAT BOOK OF 400 SECRETS, or how to make $10 a Day Without Capital. Golden Words to the Working Class. How to get Rich, or How to make Money, is a thought that occupies the attention of the human mind as much, if not more, than any other subject. In our BOOK OF SECRETS we never lose sight of the idea that we are addressing persons without capital, that very large class of our people that are battling and struggling hard through life without apparently making the slightest headway. We point out clearly how any person may make a start in business for themselves and not be dependant any longer on a paltry weekly or monthly pittance. We have started a large number of persons in business that to not leave their homes at all, and clear from $25 to $50 per week, by following strictly the directions laid down in the BOOK OF SECRETS. Reader you can make money just as fast as those we have spoken of. WILL YOU MAKE THE EFFORT? It has already paved the way for many a young man toward making his fortune, and he does not require money to start with for the Book tells him how to commence business without money, and he goes on step by step, and soon accumulates a thousand dollars or more before he has really an idea of it. Our GREAT BOOK OF SECRETS should be in the hands of every person who desires to better their condition in life—every lady that wants employment, every man, boy or girl that can spare an hour or two each day on the start. Much of the information cost us large amounts to possess with the Right to Publish the same to the world. One secret alone cost us, with the privilege to use it, $250. You can be the possessor of ALL for FIFTY CENTS. If you have an occupation that takes up your time during the day, you can devote your evenings to many branches of the business. We have given in this Book over 400 methods to make money fast. Out of all the chances that are offered, select the one in which, according to your own judgment you can do the best, and you will come out victorious in the end.

Three years ago, in the City of Philadelphia, lived a man and wife, in a garret bedroom without work, influence or friends. Fortunately for him, he was told of this Book of Secrets. He sent for it, and from his own lips, in the author's place of business he said that he made over Twelve Thousand Dollars clear from what he has been taught by this Book. ☞Please bear in mind that we send Young's Great Book of Secrets, also the Paul Brothers Violet Ink Secret, also the secret and full instructions and Agents right to manufacture the Turkish Perfume, also the Secret of Manufacturing the CHENG WENG STARCH POLISH All For Fifty Cents. Three Book of Secrets for One Dollar, get two of your friends to send with you and you will have your own book free.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Baptist pastors are evidently ashamed of their opinions, for they do not want any reporters at their association meetings.

AT a public breakfast in Scotland Joseph Cook said that he intended to visit India to preach the truth to the Hindoos. What he attempts to palm off as truth is fully ninety per cent falsehood.

THE experiment of irrigating lands in the neighborhood of Paris with water from the sewers is said to be working successfully. Steril tracts of lands hav been converted into fertil plains, while no increase of sickness among the inhabitants has followed, as was apprehended.

AT a Land League meeting in Ireland the other day, an impassioned speaker was thus declaiming: "Our creator gave the land to man for his own. He gave it first to Adam—." "Arrah, be asy about Adam," interrupted a voice from the crowd, "Adam was evicted widout compensashin."

AN Aberdeen gentleman carefully questioned the optician: "What number must I wear after these cease to be strong enough?" "This one," said the optician, showing him another pair. "And after that?" "This." "And after that?" "After that! after that! You'll need a little dog and a string!"

THERE is nothing like faith. Dr. William A. Hammond says, in the International Review, that he gave water from Lourdes to a pious patient, calling it something else, and her symptoms were at once aggravated; but when he used common water, telling her it was from the miraculous spring, she as quickly improved.

THE Chicago Sabbath Association has undertaken to enforce the Sunday law in that city. "The complaint is not so much that people work on Sunday," says the society's circular, "but that they play. It is against sinful recreation that we are moving." It is customary to open the Chicago theaters on Sunday evenings, though there is a law against it.

A GOOD parson, who had the happy faculty of saying a kind word for everybody in whose behalf one could possibly be said, recently officiated at the funeral of a farmer who was known as the meanest and most miserly man in the neighborhood. Instead of execrating the deceased for his extortionate and niggardly habits, this kindly-disposed clergyman simply spoke of him as "the best arithmetician in the county."

THE residence of the last kissing pastor is at Kingston, N. Y., and his name is Miller. This reverend gentleman called his peculiar form of osculation "holy" kissing, but that does not seem to hav made it any more pleasant to the husband in the case. But, as usual, the affair is patched up. The lady has talked her husband over, and Miller will probably not lose his seat. He will continue to break the bread of life with the same holy unction as before.

THE writer of an elaborate treatis on the origin of evil has suffered at the hands of the proof readers. He meant to say, "The soul of man is of divine origin; the body of man is of Satan." But the wicked printers hav made him to say that "the body of man is of Satin." This, however, is not worse than the case of the line of a hymn which, by a similar manipulation, or a lack of carefulness, was changed from the triumphant expression, "We raise our lofty shouts," to the very infelicitous and unpoetical one, "We raise our lofty snouts." Thus does old Satan slyly interfere with that which was meant.

FROM what is already known of the new version of the New Testament, it is certain that in at least two places a word hitherto familiar has given way to one less used in common speech. Capernaum, according to the revised texts of Luke, is "brought down unto Hades," instead of to hell, as hitherto; while in the same gospel it is said of the rich man, in the parable of Lazarus, that "in Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments." Should this substitution prove to be general, perhaps polite people, including, of course, newspapers, will henceforth feel obliged to spell the word, when used outside of scriptural connection, as H—s.

IN a Chicago church a deacon's term of office recently expired, and as the man had made himself obnoxious to his fellow church-members, they agreed to teach him a lesson by dropping him. So, to his great astonishment, when the time for election came, another man was quietly elected to fill his place. He at once resolved on revenge, and made his resolution perfect. He declared that either the pastor should leave the church within six months or else he would leave it himself. This pious ex-deacon is now reported as spending much of his time and energy in seeking to entangle the pastor in some unwise talk which will result in his downfall.

THE Salvation Army people are whacking away at each other as if they had never been friends. Commissioner Raillton writes from St. Louis concerning Bentley and Jones, who seceded from the organization and are laboring in Baltimore. He intimates that these ex-brethren are of no account as gospel laborers, and that it is to him a horrible idea that they should seek to convert the sinners of Baltimore. Bentley and Jones hav abandoned the Salvation Army uniform, and now array themselvs in garments of black cut much like those worn by high-church ministers. The army has not made the impression on this perverse and sinful generation which the announcements of its generals and other officers led the public to expect of it.

THE congregation of the Methodist church at Waterford, New Jersey, do not at present dwell together in unity. A meeting was held for the election of a board of trustees. There has been considerable dissatisfaction manifested lately at the action of some of the church's officers, and the election was an exciting one. After the choice had been made, two of the officers, one of whom was disappointed and angry at the result of the ballot, began to abuse each other. Each charged the other with dishonesty, and they were about to exchange blows, when friends interfered and separated them. The meeting was dismissed, but the pugnaciously inclined Christians renewed the quarrel in front of the house of worship. Friends again prevented the fight.

THE Rev. Henry Ward Beecher probably surprised some of his congregation a week ago by announcing that he had cancelled all his lecturing engagements and proposed to begin a series of revival meetings in the church. He wanted Plymouth Church to carry a torch of light above the world when he first took hold of the work, and now he wanted to develop personal religion in the hearts of the people. He was ready to carry on the work and to do all that he knew to aid the people in the Lord's work. He did not want to work alone, but he had no fear of a lack of sympathy and support. The meetings will be commenced next week, and will be held every day, beginning at four o'clock in the afternoon. When Beecher goes into the crazy revival business it is about time for the end of the world.

THE Appellate Court in Paris the other day quashed a sentence of three months' imprisonment for incendiarism passed on a man named Didier, it being proved that the defendant was a somnambulist, and irresponsible in that state for his acts. A doctor sent him to sleep in an ante-chamber of the court by simply looking fixedly at him, and then, retiring to a distance, pronounced his name, whereupon Didier rushed toward him, despite the efforts of the turnkeys to prevent him. In the presence of the judges, moreover, he wrote a letter with his eyes shut from dictation, and a large needle was stuck into his neck without his betraying any sign of sensibility. A fit of somnambulism, it was stated, sometimes comes on him while walking out of doors, and when in the hospital he was observed copying music, having no recollection of it on awaking. The doctors there also noticed his automatic submission. The court accordingly ruled that he was not morally or legally responsible for his actions.

A PAPER which Mr. John Aitken recently read before the Royal Society of Edinburg is a remarkable contribution to the subject of the origin of the fogs, mists, and clouds. According to Mr. Aitken, who has made a great many experiments with moist air at various temperatures to determin the conditions which produce condensation of water vapor, the latter always condenses in the atmosphere on some solid nucleus. He further concludes that dust particles in the air form the nucleus on which the vapor condenses, that, if there were no dust, there would be no fogs, no mists, no clouds, and probably no rain; that the supersaturated air converts every object on the surface of the earth into a condenser, on which it would deposit as dew; and, finally, that our breath, when it becomes visible on a frosty morning, and every puff of steam as it escapes into the air from an engin, show the impure and dusty state of the atmosphere. These results hav been verified by Mr. Aitken at temperatures as low as 14° Fahr.

THE people of the churches of Brooklyn are by no means enthusiastic in regard to the movement of a few of the dominies for a day of fasting and prayer. The fact is largely commented on that some of these dominies are not sufficiently in accord with each other to render their co-operation in efforts to secure a revival very felicitous. Two of the brethren were conspicuously arrayed against each other in one of the greatest church fights that ever agitated Brooklyn, while one of the others recently spent Sunday morning in denouncing from his pulpit the blameworthy course of another brother in making an exchange of denominations. This last-named brother has exposed himself to the criticism of his fellow-workers by condemning the style of most of the sermons which Brooklyn people listen to, and by saving that it takes three thousand such sermons as are now preached to make one convert. It is thought by some, even of those who would like to hav a revival, that if the proportion of converts to sermons is to be as light as this, there will not be sermon power enough on Long Island to make a mark on such an ungodly population as Brooklyn contains.

ANOTHER minister, the Rev. Thomas P. Slicer, of Brooklyn, has renounced evangelical orthodoxy. He announces that, in his opinion, old theology is breaking down and giving away, and that he cannot obtain the consent of his conscience to preach it longer. He is only one among many ministers who hav of late years thrown off their orthodox allegiance, and the majority of them hav been, like him, expounders of the old Puritan faith as expressed in Congregationalism. And if what Mr. Slicer charges is true, the only reason why the number is not far greater is that his clerical brethren are afraid to declare their real opinions. Among themselvs, he says, they agree with him in thinking that the life has gone out of the orthodoxy they profess and assume to preach; but they dare not make the admission in public. They therefore content themselvs with avoiding any discussion of the old dogmas in their sermons, and carefully abstain from giving expression in the pulpit to their honest opinions of them, lest they shock their congregations, and so imperil their livelihood. "They hav their livings to earn and their families to support," says Mr. Slicer, "but I am young, strong, and healthy. I can earn my living, and I cannot conceal my conscientious convictions."

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.D.

The abbe said: "You come very near the truth. Virtue can contribute much to our peace, but not all. Am I mistaken, my beloved ones, if I believe that each one of you takes too one-sided a view of man? The one of you sees in him nothing but the sensual being, exposed to the wildest storms, as well as to the gentlest flattering breezes of life; the other views him only as spirit, and only as such independent of flesh and blood! Ah, my beloved ones, let us ask of ourselvs, for the sake of a one sided opinion, neither too much nor too little. Let us remember that we are not merely spirit!"

I thought it proper to interrupt the abbe, saying, "You are of the opinion, then, that virtue alone, and the consciousness of having done right, are in themselvs not sufficient to make us lastingly blissful?"

"Very well, I do not mean to be mistaken," replied Dillon. "You remarked a little while ago that no misfortunes were able to disturb the blissful condition of a righteous man. O friend, I hav seen, during my long life, many a noble man to whom his virtue has given no consolation. Just take an everyday life's occurrence. Hav you not among your acquaintances an upright man who suffers from hypochondria? The good-natured hypochondriac who for the welfare of his fellow-man makes the greatest sacrifices will yet anxiously draw in question his own virtue. He sees committed faults floating before him like gigantic specters, and of the good seed that he has sown he knows not where it fell. At all events, I believe there is in this world none so wholly disconsolate and unhappy as the hypochondriac who prefers the unconsciousness of sleep, or non-existence, to wakefulness, or even the consciousness of high honesty. But you will tell me he is sick! Well, my dear, he is nevertheless a man without a blissful disposition, notwithstanding all his virtue. This, therefore, does not suffice to make him happy."

Roderick assented to the abbe. I felt the force of his objection, as I myself knew one of the noblest men, who, in spite of all his self-denial, never felt that sacred quietude of his inmost being which I had made the heritage of the pure heart.

Dillon continued after a pause: "Man is not spirit alone; he is so closely interwoven with the physical that we hardly dare draw the line between the two. Therefore the most virtuous one is not always pleased with the memory of his past, and the honest man can be plunged into circumstances where the consciousness of goodness alone is incapable of giving him consolation, much less of raising him above his misery. Nay, still more, we are not always strong enough, with the best will, to let our reason speak; we only too often sink relaxed back into the embrace of our sensual nature. Here, my beloved ones, is needed another staff on which the sufferer may lean if he is not to become a prey to his misery."

CHAPTER II.

Dillon was silent. I felt myself not entirely refuted, but my positions, which I believed to hav universal value, were opposed only by exceptions and doubts. The opponent had only aroused, not satisfied, my curiosity. "It needs another staff than virtue," said he, but as yet he had not named it.

I turned to him, and noticed now that he was occupied with a great thought, or under the influence of a powerful emotion. The venerable man leaned his arm upon a rock; his head had sunk down upon his breast. A melancholy seriousness was visible in every feature, which otherwise wore only the expression of the mildest repose.

My friend Roderick, also, was not indifferent to the melancholy mood of the abbe.

"You are growing sad," said he, and pressed his hand warmly. "Look up, dear Dillon, the evening is too beautiful; shall we willingly spoil our enjoyment of it?

"It is true," said Dillon, and smiled again. "But I am not sad. Our conversation touched the most beautiful secrets and desires of humanity. There arose in my memory a thousand presentations and recollections, and I saw again in spirit that saintly form which had appeared to me in the days of my youth, and to my erring soul, like a genius, showed the better path—good Alamontada! calm, amiable sufferer! Am I not right, beloved ones, you know this dear name already?"

"To me it is entirely unknown," said I, "and yet I believe I hav heard you mention it once before."

"Alamontada!" exclaimed Roderick; "what! the galley-slave, from whom you read to me that sublime passage out of yonder bundle of papers? Truly I am sorry that the fellow, with all his genius, ended at the galleys. He might hav risen to eminence. But how then? You seem to esteem him from still another side, as you giv him that flattering title."

"Of him I can speak only with reverence," said the aged man; "he has been to me, throughout the whole course of my life, the most remarkable personage. Through him I was restored to myself and the world. Oh, what unspeakable good he has done me! and not even a 'thank you' has he received in return."

Dillon was deeply moved. Beneath his gray eyelashes melted a tear. His lips quivered as if whispering in low tones. The melancholy mood of the venerable old man seemed to impart itself to us, and each one gave himself up to the turbulent current of his emotions; none disturbed the other's meditation.

I shall never forget this beautiful moment. Even nature about us seemed sympathizingly to enter into our dreams. We sat in the shade of the rocks; but before us floated in a bright, half-transparent mist the mountain range, with its peacable Alpine world, the hights of which were wreathed with the glory of a gold-red sky. And darkly, between them and here, the lake spread itself beneath our feet. So separates the fathomless grave from the paradise of eternity, which we sometimes behold in imagination.

Like a soft breath from the other shore, the evening air, slightly ruffling the surface of the lake, floated coolingly around our temples, and lost itself, sounding in the thicket above us like a sigh.

Dillon awoke. He seized our hands, drew us near him, and said: "You, loved ones, are young and happy! Easy it is to smile when life smiles upon us, and to find order and goodness everywhere, and in the hours of leisure to build systems for humanity."

"You hav really alarmed me, dear abbe," said I to him," and all that I hear from you assures me that for some unknown reason you deviate from my own convictions. But, I conjure you, explain yourself more fully. Tell me, what is there in this world better and more consoling than virtue? What comfort in suffering is sweeter than that which innocence givs to our souls? What strengthens the heart more against a world full of enemies than the feeling of uprightness? I know no other support in the day of trial than this. Nature offers it to every mortal."

"Well, my beloved ones," said the abbe, "the evening is beautiful. We cannot enjoy it better than in mutual conversation, in which the soul must lift itself up to the sanctuaries of humanity. As I before spoke the name of Alamontada, I was then ready to do what you now ask of me. I wanted to relate to you who that noble one was, and how I made his acquaintance, and how he departed from me. These recollections of him are still beneficial and refreshing to me."

"Relate!" cried Roderick. "A man, a galley-slave, whom Dillon honors with so much sincerity must be an extraordinary man."

"Before I begin the story itself," said the abbe, "may I first be allowed a remark? You must, before you hear the narrativ, become acquainted with Alamontada's spirit; without the latter you would not be able to understand the former. You would, as it were, stand beside a beautiful corpse, and long in vain for its missing soul.

"You also hav (and your happy youth protects you not against the serious thought that, sooner or later, comes to every independent thinker with irresistible force) you also hav already, as your conversations betray, meditated upon the aim and destiny of your existence upon this earth. I request you to pursue this thought; for what is there of greater importance to us here below?

"Man is born, by slow degrees becomes conscious of existence, and ripens into maturity. Without his wish he was placed in this endless universe. An unknown power thrust him into this life of turmoil between flowers and thorns; he smiles among those, and weeps bleeding beneath these, and asks, 'Who cast me hither? Who has the right to deprive me of what I possessed before, insensibility, non-existence?' But no voice responds to his questions.

"He may console himself about the darkness from which he emerged, but he does not remain indifferent to the changes of the present. 'Who am I?' asks he. 'What am I to do in this world? Why must I liv? Is it to learn an art, a handicraft, or a science, by means of which I can finally procure for myself a shelter, food, clothes, and certain comforts of life? That would be a miserable aim, not worth the pain of existence and the many tears. And yet every thing in human life tends toward that, as if that were the principal object. Every one labors, gathers, presses on to increase wealth, possession, and power, and is suspended between cares and hopes, and judges others only by this standard. The world thus resembles a desert, in which all seek and struggle and save in order to secure themselvs against starvation.

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

V.—The Devil.

TEXT.—And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life; and I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel. —Gen. iii, 14, 15.

The crime which the serpent had committed was his exposure to Eve of the Lord's deceit.

The Lord had said that in the day man ate of the fruit of the tree of knowledge he should surely die. But the serpent told Eve it would not be so, and she ate. So did Adam. And they lived for nearly a thousand years. It is not strange that the Lord should hav vented his rage upon the wily serpent who had penetrated his deceit and circumvented his design to keep the human family in a state of ignorance.

It is quite evident that the serpent here referred to was not a god, but one of the animals whom the Lord had created and which had passed before Adam for a name. Whether he walked upright, or was a quadruped, or whatever shape he possessed, there can be no question that he was an animal—not a spirit.

"The serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made," says the first verse of the chapter. "Thou art cursed above all cattle and every beast of the field," "upon thy belly shalt thou go," "dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life," and the woman's seed "shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel," says the text. Here is nothing to indicate that the serpent was a spiritual adversary. Clearly the reference is to one of God's mundane creations—the snake.

Viewing the narrativ as an allegory there is no difficulty of explanation. The snake has always been a repulsiv object. From the earliest times it has gone upon its belly. There has always been enmity between it and the seed of woman. And her seed has bruised its head, while it has bruised his heel. What more natural to the ignorant mind than to attribute this inborn enmity between man and the snake to a curse? When the barbarian poet sang of the creation, of original innocence, of the introduction of knowledge and the origin of sin, his imagination sought from among living things one upon which, apparently, there rested a curse, for a representativ of the instigator and promoter of sin. He found it in the most repulsiv reptil of the earth, which he presented as originally an animal of the field whom God had degraded. Thus the introduction of knowledge and sin, which are truthfully linked together—for perfect innocence and perfect ignorance are almost synonymous—is represented by the eating of a forbidden fruit, while the degraded condition of the snake is accounted for by a divine punishment imposed upon him for playing the part of a tempter.

A mind unfettered by theological dogmas will accept this story of the creation and the fall as an allegory, leading up to a recognized condition of man and his surroundings, rather than a narrativ of actual facts. Adam and Eve are personifications of prehistoric man; the forbidden fruit is a representativ of the principle of evil which is supposed to exist in the human mind; and as a people not given to abstract contemplation look to an external influence for the original temptation to sin, the serpent is given that role, and his degraded condition is accounted for by the curse which followed his interference.

But whether this story was written only as an allegory or as a divine historical revelation, there can be no intelligent doubt that the serpent cursed in the text was not a spirit, but only the progenitor of modern snakes.

Indeed, there does not appear in the scriptures to hav been a belief among the Jews in an evil spirit until long after their passage of the Red Sea. The only spirit recognized is Jehovah himself, and the only antagonists with which he is brought in contact are men and gods of alien nations and this serpent of the text.

Gradually, however, a devil in constant conflict with the Almighty found a place in the theology of the Jews, and eventually became so thoroughly naturalized that when Christianity separated from Judaism Satan was taken along as a necessary part of the theological furniture, and afterward ornamented and adorned with the cast-off garments of the devils of heathen mythology.

And now the devil of Christianity is falsely identified by theologians with the serpent which tempted Eve in the Garden of Eden.

All the ancient religions patronized devils. The Brahmans had their Siva, the author of sin and death, the promoter of generation, and the antagonist of Brahma, the creator. The Persians had their Arimanes, condemned to remain three thousand years in the realm of shadows—while Ormuzd, the god of light, created the bright and beautiful world—and who on his release assumed command of the forces of evil to wage a relentless war upon Ormuzd. Arimanes even transformed himself into a serpent by eating a certain fruit, and glided upon his belly in the dust, tempting mankind to sin. The Egyptians had their Typhon, the power of evil and a bitter enemy of Osiris. And Pluto, of the Greek mythology is so familiar to the ordinary reader that he need only be referred to.

May we not in these myths of ancient heathen—more ancient than the nation of the Jews—find the origin of the devil of our day?

All these devils were of nearly or quite equal power with the god of light and good. So is the Christian devil. They were all adversaries of the god of their respectiv mythologies, and though at times defeated they were never conquered. So with his satanic majesty. Siva was the author of sin and death and the promoter of generation according to the Hindoos. So was Satan according to Christian theology, which erroneously assumes that the serpent of Eden was the identical devil who tempted Christ on the mount. Arimanes was cursed by the good god of the Persians. So was the subtle serpent of Genesis by the God of the Jews. He commanded the powers of evil against the holy battalions of Ormuzd. So Satan commands the legions of fallen angels in hell against the hosts of heaven. Arimanes even gave the god of the Jews a suggestion for his allegorical description of the fall of man by eating a mysterious fruit, and in the form of a serpent tempting mankind to sin.

That there is an evil influence acting upon mankind no one can or will deny. But it is innate in the human mind. It is an individual propensity. It proceeds from the spirit of selfishness which to a greater or less degree animates every man. Much of the so-called sin in the world, however, is only a revolt against an artificial code of morals established by theologians. Men are not disposed to murder or steal or otherwise injure their neighbor unless cupidity, anger, or revenge, all legitimate children of selfishness, prompts them. But they are disposed to violate the thousand and one commands of the church, which are sinful only because the church says they are sinful.

This selfish spirit from which emanates all the really sinful acts of man, we repeat, is an influence from within, and such it has always been. No devil, no serpent, no personal spirit, now prompts or ever prompted it. The contrary theory had its rise among ancient, imaginativ, and non-speculativ people, whose minds at the time the theory originated were not sufficiently comprehensiv to grasp any metaphysical idea pr sented in abstract form. Their ideas were personified. It was so with the Hindoos, with the Egyptians, with the Persians, even with the Greeks and with the Jews.

The Jews at first, according to the sacred writer, made one god, the creator and governor of all things, wherein they had a rational advantage over other nations who distributed supernatural functions among a variety of gods. But in time the Jews transferred the superintendence of sin to Satan, and now Christianity, which grew from the root of Judaism, and upon which heathen mythology was grafted at an early day, recognizes him as a distinct god in hourly conflict with the Almighty for possession of the world and the souls of men.

Where We Are Going.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It will giv me much pleasure to correspond with your paper whenever events or thoughts in my journeyings furnish worthy material for your crowded columns.

Does it ever occur to you that many Liberals who write and speak much and well hardly appreciate the magnitude of the great work we hav in hand? The difference between a moral and a political movement in human affairs need not be, should not be very great. But such is the present type of American politics that the difference is wide as heaven and hell. The clergy hav married the church to the government, and a vast moneyed monopoly now rules both. So we are even now not a democracy but a plutocracy, and tending more and more to a theocracy in fact if not in form. The lords of the lash forty years ago cared nothing for party names. Whig or Democrat was all the same to them. An oligarchy of slave-holders was the thing desired, and the thing they had, too, for forty years, though slave-owners were more numerous then than are great monopolists and millionaires to-day.

And the slave-owners were always on the verge, if not over the verge, of bankruptcy. And yet they ruled. They were always a minority in Congress, and yet they ruled. And the clergy sanctified with sermon, sacrament, and solemn prayer the slave system with all its abominations—"abominations that well might shame extremest hell!"

And if a comparativly few slave-holders, and miserably poor besides, could, with the aid of the clergy, control the government completely, no matter what party was in power, years after years, what cannot be done now when the ruling party has not only the support of church and clergy, but nearly all the wealth too, individual and massed into ring and monopoly, at the nation's command? And when church and state are so nearly one as that, a trinitarian preacher can be made President of the United States.

One thought more, and charge your readers not to forget it.

Exactly as the Democratic party gave itself away to slavery and slave-holders after the administration of John Quincy Adams, which closed in 1829, just so since the abolition of slavery has the Republican party made itself the subtle, willing, unscrupulous ally of moneyed monopoly, until now the rule of the controlers of the cash is becoming more intolerable than ever was the reign of the "lords of the lash."

Be Temperate in Temperance.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your paper of January 8th I notice a communication on temperance by C. L. Morgan. And as I think C. L. Morgan somewhat out of place as a Liberal, I must hav a word to say in this temperance talk.

C. L. Morgan is somewhat like a lady that I am well acquainted with, who about a year ago lost four of her children by scarlet fever. After burying them her remaining child took it. The doctor concluded to change treatment, and said he would giv some whisky toddy. The mother replied that she would rather see him dead and buried with the rest than that he should taste whisky. Oh, such bigotry! Away with such nonsense! If whisky will save life, we want it for that purpose, but not to use until it has destroyed the life it has saved.

Let us be wise and be liberal. I hav known several persons in my lifetime whose lives were saved by whisky. But that does not make me believe that I ought to drink it like water and make myself worse than a hog. I hav seen several who hav been ruined by it, and a miserable death has been their portion. I hav used it too much in my life, but hav not let one drop pass my mouth for more than a year, nor do I expect to only as medicin. But if I thought it would do me good, I would use it, or any other poison, and I think I ought to be the judge. I am willing to leave every one to judge for himself, and I think that C. L. Morgan and others ought to do the same. There is too much orthodoxy in this dictation to suit me.

A Letter from Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Our cold weather commenced with the first days of November, 1880, the thermometer registering 6° below zero, something unusual for our Kansas climate. Our coldest morning was that of January 14—21° below zero. We hav had continual cold weather since the 1st of November, with occasionally an intermission of a day or two. There is ice on the Neosho, and water has been very low in rivers, creeks, and wells; but the spell was broken on the 5th inst. It has rained and snowed for forty-eight hours, during which time eight inches of water hav fallen. We think here that it is the advance of the snow storm that prevailed throughout the North and East on the 1st and 2d. The coldest winter I hav experienced in nine years' residence in Kansas was '78 and '79. Sixteen inches of snow fell on the 12th and 13th of December, and we had good sleighing for forty days. The mercury registered in all during the winter 182° below zero. The coldest days were the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th ot January, 15, 18, 19, and 20 below zero. The 2d, 3d, and 4th it was at and below zero during the three days.

The question is being agitated in the columns of The Truth Seeker whether Bro. Bennett shall circumnavigate our mundane sphere; and I hasten to giv my opinion on the subject for what it is worth by answering, Yes, for we hav had positiv proof from your letters while making your limited tour in Europe that you can write up the history of the country and people in advance of any writer and traveler I hav ever perused. By all means go, and I will contribute something if possible. I am a mechanic, nearly sixty-three, and not very flush in the material requisit to the advancement of reform, as I would like to be.

In your travels we hav it demonstrated that the pen is more potent than the sword in the elevation of our race, for we hav had the public exhibition of a man in the person of U. S. Grant, whom the politicians caused to make the trip for a third term purpose; and what did we learn of benefit to our country? I answer, Nothing. He was looked upon by foreign aristocrats and potentates as a wonderful man because he had commanded large armies and butchered men, and during his eight years as President approved more unjust and oppressiv laws, the Comstock law not excepted, than all the Presidents before him, and in fact his administration was devoid of statesmanship, and a failure. As to the welfare of our country, his financial policy reminds me of a circumstance that happened a number of years ago near Albany, N. Y. A farmer wished his boy to market some wheat for him at Albany, but he could not enumerate dollars and cents, so the father told him to accept nothing but "round shiners," meaning one dollar per bushel. Arriving in market, he was offered $1 50, but, intent on having the shiners, he refused. The purchasers finally learned what he wanted, and paid him one dollar a bushel, and he returned home happy at his success. Grant's executiv ability as chief magistrate is a parallel case. He could see no value in any money except the round shiners, and every message teemed with resumption, crushing the business life of our nation to death. Oh, the curses that his administration has entailed on our poor country! I will add that I was a Grant man, and voted for him both terms.

Better late than never! If this communication is not too wearisome I would like to add a word in commendation of the efforts of sister Slenker to elevate our race out of the quagmire of sexual intemperance. Of the many different questions that are being agitated for the improvement of the people, I think this the most important; and of all the curses this curse is the most prolific of family quarrels, entailing on our posterity the disease of inordinate lust for the gratification of our baser passions. This intemperance is one of the most damnable evils extant.

Bro. J. H. Cook, in your issue of Jan. 22d, struck another key note of reform. His article is virtually on hereditary transmission, although he givs it another name. I consider it a twin to the evil which Mrs. Slenker condemns, but born of different parents. When we take into consideration that during three fourths of a year of our existence in an embryotic state we are subject to the maternal will, and that that will is influenced by surrounding circumstances, we are astonished to see how indifferent people generally are in regard to the laws governing the procreation of our species. Excessiv indulgence of the baser passions is the cause of over-population, pauperism, crime, and untold misery. If we understood the laws of hereditary transmission we should make fewer cruel laws and would hav more charity for our fellow-man and try to elevate his moral, mental, and physical condition through the instrumentality of the laws of humanity, and would depend less on physical force so characteristic in the execution of the laws of our country.

I am a radical Liberal. My platform is broad enough far all questions.

Chris. Brown.

To Elmina's Critic.

First and foremost, few of us liv as well as we know. We see higher and better truths than we carry out in daily life. Elmina does not claim to be perfect. She does not say she teaches only what she livs, but that she aims to liv as nearly what she thinks right and true as is practicable.

She is not entirely convinced that vegetarianism is best for all constitutions and conditions.

What would the Esquimaux do if compelled to liv on fruits and grains?

We must use discretion and judgment in all things. Pork, as a rule, is unhealthful. Yet even hogs, if reared as they are here, on open range where they can be clean and breathe pure air, may make more healthful meat than stall-fed cattle or cholera-diseased fowls, or bad wheat full of smut, or milk and cheese from sickly cows. I eat very little lard or sausage, and use less spices. But I do not entirely eschew them as I do fermented liquors, for I do not consider them so entirely innutritious and poisonous. Nor do I think a small cup of weak coffee as harmful as a glass of ice-water if taken only once a day at meal-time. Milk is better than either, and so perhaps is moderately cool water.

And as to the hygienic dress, it was not unretained because of "vicious frowns," but simply because our family did not like me to be so marked an object of distinction for so little of real utility. I am not sure but that my present dress is the more hygienic of the two. It is all (even underclothes) cut loose, wrapper fashion; no belts, no undue pressure on any parts, and the air can freely circulate over the whole body, which, with pants buttoned at the ankles, it would not do. The loose, flowing Grecian robe has generally carried off the palm, but for some kinds of work the short dress is preferable, and let those who need it be free to wear it. I did when I felt it best. Each must judge as to the personal happiness and convenience as to what dress best suits, providing all are hygienic.

And the same as regards sexual commerce. Very few will be materially injured by even a monthly indulgence, but is it highest and best? Is it really right? Is this pure nature? Should pleasure ever come in where so important a question as the generation of species is concerned?

Elmina leaves all free, and would restrict no one's "privileges." She only points out the right as she sees it. She might not object to "arms full of angels," if she could really believe in such feathered creatures, such intangible etherealizations. In the mean time, we'll all seek for the best, and liv it as far as we can.

Sister Mary is one of our greatest leaders, and those who follow her will not be greatly led astray, even if they hav now and then a false dream of angels' wings.

Heartily and truly,

Snowville, Va. Elmina D. Slenker.

Miscellaneous.

Repairing Paine's Monument.

The subscriptions for this necessary work hav not come in as freely as desirable. It would seem that the only monument in the country erected to the memory of the man we so much revere should not go another year in the dilapidated condition in which it now is. The following are the sums donated up to the present time:

M. Reiman,	$5.00	Dr. E. B. Foote,	$1.00
Infidelis,	1.00	H. B. Brown,	1.00
D. M. Bennett,	1.00	Rufus Perkins,	1.00
W. F. Porter,	.25	Augustus Owen,	1.00
G. S. Mc——,	1.00	E. M. Macdonald,	1.00
Wm. T. Costigan,	1.00	W. H. Burr,	2.00
Newark L. League,	5.00	Robt Legg,	.25
John Johnson,	.25	James Levesey,	.25
John Musgrove,	.25	Robert Cardwell,	.25
Henry Cardwell,	.25

Let the generous-hearted who honor the memory of Thomas Paine help a little in the needful work.

A. Briggs Davis, editor and publisher of the Battle-Axe, which many of our readers will remember, passed his fiftieth birthday on February 27th. We learn he is in poor health and also in impecunious circumstances. We hav been invited to say to our readers that donations to him will be acceptable. We extend the invitation along the line that those who feel to remember him in any amount they choose may feel free to do so. His address is Brentwood, N. Y.

Comstock Trying to Become a Mason.

In a recent issue our readers were informed how the infamous man Comstock was trying to improve his own reputation and befoul that of the order by applying for a membership. That he has not found entrance to the ancient and honorable order is easily seen. The following notice of his case appeared in the Corner Stone, a Masonic journal, of Jan. 29th:

"Some person had the temerity to accept the application of that miserable spy, Anthony Comstock, for initiation and advancement in our Mystic Art, and placing the same in Aurora Grata Lodge 756, Brooklyn. The record of this famed lodge, which has been so honorably distinguished by its present R. W. Master, Bro. Wm. H. White, should not be marred by one whose reputation we refrain from discussing in these columns. Let Comstock continue on in his vocation; every age and every country has its decoys and spies, but Masonry needs material different from Comstock—men, not puppets."

The same journal of Feb. 5th contained the following:

"Our remarks in last issue, referring to the spy-decoy Comstock, hav been generally commented upon by craftsmen, and the opinions universally expressed are in perfect accord with what then appeared. One venerable brother who occupied the position of Treasurer many years ago in Excelsior Lodge 195 was much gratified with the Only Live for taking a stand against the admission of this cur into our honorable fraternity."

The issue of Feb. 12th had this:

"We trust that the following will suffice, which we select from among a number, to show that the decoy spy is not wanted in our honorable fraternity. We answer to the following that Comstock has not as yet been initiated, so we learn, and the lodge is Aurora Grata 756, which meets at 306 Fulton street, Brooklyn, on the second and fourth Wednesday evening of each month.

"'Corner Stone: Can you furnish the information through your live paper what lodge initiated into its companionship that ravenous wolf in sheep's clothing whom you call Cur Comstock, for there are those who wish to avoid his fraternal friendship, on the principle that truth and light hav no fellowship with "ways that are dark and tricks that are mean?"

"'No good cause needs propping by lying and trickery, and if Comstock's methods of suppressing evil makes him a "hero," as the New Hampshire Journal says, then the church had better adopt this "hero's" method of turning men from sin to holiness. M. M.'"

In the same journal of Feb. 19th is this brief notice:

"The decoy-spy Comstock will be balloted for in Aurora Grata Lodge 756, on Wednesday, February 23d, at its rooms, 306 Fulton street, Brooklyn. It is the duty of every brother who has written to the C. S. regarding this cur, to visit Aurora Grata Lodge."

It is to be hoped that the notorious informer and spy will be blackballed in the next meeting of the Aurora Grata Lodge, and the despised man thus will be justly rebuked. A period of six months must elapse before he can make application for membership to any other lodge, when it is to be hoped he will be as well understood as he is now. No honorable society wants such a person for a member.

Book Notice.

Is Darwin Right? or, the Origin of Man. By William Denton, Wellesley, Mass. Denton Publishing Co. 1881.

This last work of Prof. Denton's treats of the subject in the author's usual scientific, liberal, and honest manner, going right to the root of the question.

He agrees with Darwin, Wallace, Huxley, Haeckel, and others in the natural origin of man, but goes further in some respects. He shows that there is no more necessity for a miracle in one part of the line of life than another. The idea that God ever "breathed the breath of life" into anything is not entertained by this bold and eminent thinker, and in this he differs from Darwin.

The professor claims that as no miracle is dragged in to account for the formation of a crystal none is necessary for the first forms of life.

The various methods of progression in life by variation, hereditary transmission, modification, and natural selection are ably treated and expounded by him, backed by the ablest scientific names of the day, in the first part of the work.

In the next portion of the work the significance of the "pointers" in geological succession, rudimentary organs, etc., are taken up.

His main difference with the men who advocate the natural origin of man consists in bringing in the spiritual part of the question, and in the idea of a spirit, who is a part of nature, not outside of her, and has pushed on the development of man. He says matter is alive, and claims that the Darwinian school treats matter as dead. They think it doubtful if man could again appear on the earth if it was to be reduced to a molten state, while he believes that man is the fruit of worlds and the object to which nature pushes whenever she has a chance.

The work givs the whole of the development theory in a small space, ably handled, for a most reasonable figure.

It is a work of one hundred and eighty-seven pages, finely printed and bound, with over forty engravings. Price, postpaid, $1. For sale at this office.

"Sexual Ethics."—A private letter to parents, physicians, and men principals of schools, relating to sexual ethics, has been recently issued by the Moral Education Society. It is worthy the attention of every one who desires the increase of public and private morality. It will be sent for a three-cent stamp by the Moral Education Society, No. 1 Grant Place, Washington, D. C.

To the Liberal Public.

Dear Friends: I owe you the profound gratitude of my heart for the interest many of you hav taken in my utterances since I left the service of theology. I hav been too much occupied in the struggle of life to answer all the personal letters that hav come to me. Let me thank you for your words of cheer, admiration, and earnest sympathy. I desire to spend the balance of my days in working for the perfect enfranchisement of the human mind. I hav undertaken to deliver a regular weekly lecture in Paine Memorial Hall, Boston. I should like, as far as possible, to hav you all members of my parish. Will you join it?

My plan to allow you to do this is to publish my lectures in regular weekly numbers. I cannot, however, do this until I hav subscribers enough to pay the printer's bill. Will all who will take a weekly copy of my lecture, at one dollar a year, please drop me a postal card to that effect? The money can be sent as soon as convenient on the receipt of the first lecture. If every one who reads this notice will immediately become a subscriber I shall be made very happy. Yours for liberty or death,

George Chainey.

Dr. Franklin Didn't Say It.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Misled by a blunderer, whose name I still mercifully suppress, I did not dispute the authenticity of his assertion that Benjamin Franklin said that the Declaration of Independence "was definitivly drafted by Jefferson." The mistake is repeated by the chief of blunderers, Mr. Underwood, in the Seymour Times, and with an air of triumph he asks, "Was Franklin, too, guilty of deliberate lying as to the authorship of that paper?"

I hav just taken the trouble to look up the authority, and I am happy to find that Benjamin Franklin never told that lie—never said anything of the kind. It was another lesser Franklin who said it, and he didn't know any more about it than any of my assailants.

Wm. Temple Franklin wrote the memoirs of his grandfather Benjamin, and published the work in 1809. On page 360, Vol. I., speaking of the Declaration of Independence, the grandson says, "It was definitivly drafted by that eminent patriot and friend of mankind, Thomas Jefferson." W. H. B.

That Forged Letter of Cotton Mather.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The clumsy forgery of a letter by Cotton Mather, proposing to capture Wm. Penn and his crew of Quakers, and sell them for rum and sugar, reappears in The Truth Seeker once more. I hav several times exposed the fraud, but I suppose it will continue, nevertheless, to be believed, like the gospel forgeries. On the 15th of September 1682, Cotton Mather, a divinity student, 19 years of age (he was ordained two years later), writes like a man of authority, in the General Court of Massachusetts, knowing all about a vessel, its captain and passengers, then about fifteen days at sea from England. The forgery first appeared in the Easton (Pa.) Argus in 1870, and was then very different from the present version, which changes some of the names and circumstances. It would be interesting to reproduce the two versions in double columns, they would differ just like the old canonical and apocryphal stories. W. H. B.

Rawson on the Vice Society.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: My intention in attending the seventh annual meeting of Comstock's Vice Society was to report their proceedings, supposing that the customary brag, bluster, and bombast would be the order of the evening exercises. Our former friendly admonitions had produced a salutary effect, and there was less lying, less deceiving by cooked-up reports, less misleading by imaginary or exaggerated statements of the awful moral condition of our public schools, fewer cases in which "our agent" had risked his precious life in the defense of purity (Query, How about Greene street?), and actually no attacks on Infidels nor blasphemy. And yet the whole tone of the meeting was a deep color of misrepresentation and acting for effect. The venerable, gray-haired President (Vaseline Preventiv) Colgate tried to look and act like an innocent man who had not violated the law he pretends to be activ in enforcing. The reverend young prayer-maker stiffly moved through his part like a third-rate actor, pretending to instruct his God as to what would be acceptable from him in aid of the society, and really trying to teach the dearly-beloved brethren how to contribute, but considering that the baskets returned nothing to speak of, he also failed. The Rev. Dr. Thomas did his acting to order and with better success than most of the others, but even he played against the grain of his coarse make-up in slandering the ancient Greek artists on a subject impossible for such men as he to know enough about to be consistent and reasonable. He indulged in oratorial fireworks of the cheap kind, which fizz and stink. The dramatic effect of announcing the contributions of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt and some nameless person (possibly Mr. President Colgate) fell quite flat. There was not even one clap or cheer.

The star of the performance was of course "our agent." His effort was carefully prepared for him by some paid writer, except the hypocritical and canting phrases, which were evidently original. He began by an expression of "gratitude to almighty God" and a quotation, "God moves in a mysterious way," and proceeded to giv his own biography in outline, omitting some details that were necessary to a statement that should hav at least hinted at "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." There are some of his victims who were induced by him to commit crime that he might hav them punished for his glory who would not join in his expressions of gratitude to his almighty God, unless they believed his God capable of doing similar or worse things, and then they could only pretend to be grateful as Comstock does now. If his God moves in a mysterious way, and Dr. Crosby indorses the mystery, deceit, and decoy business, of course he can only go ahead in his work of secretly undermining the reputation of some unsuspecting man or woman engaged in honestly earning a living. Such mystery is not as popular as it once was—say in the glorious time of the Spanish Inquisition, or even three years since, when in the fourth annual report of this society it was so confidently assumed that Freethinkers were soon to be stamped out like a small fire. And yet "our agent," speaking in his character of secretary of the Vice Society, took extra care to say that it was not the business of the society to create crime. We never used the word "create," preferring the non-theological word "manufacture," and we insist that "our agent" should go to Albany, not to get power to usurp the duties of the police, but to amend the title of his society, as before suggested, by adding the word "manufacture."

The raid on the lottery dealers is legitimate and congenial work, and one in which all honest men and women can wish them success, but why not leave that work to the police? Pay the police and the Vice Society both for one work? The lottery, whether in a church or in a policy shop, is a means of enriching a few at the expense of the many, and in the hands of unprincipled managers is simply an organized system of deceit, fraud, and robbery, falling almost wholly on the poorer working classes. A religious society like Comstock's should begin with the church lotteries, when they would make some healthy public opinion with which to attack Simmons & Co.

On leaving the hall I was accosted by Mr. Britton, who seems to wear his livery as assistant vice agent somewhat uneasily. If he does not like his work, as he seems to wish us to believe, why does he not seek some other occupation? Actions speak louder than words. His work is congenial or he would leave it to others to do. He hoped The Truth Seeker would not scathe him as it has in the past. It will not, so far as I am concerned, without just and sufficient provocation, as it has always had. It requires more than ordinary reticence to look on while human vampires rend and gnaw the innocent and unsuspecting, and more than ordinary prudence to withhold action when a well-known bad and vicious fraud and decoy is seeking under cover of a religious cloak to enter a society that could be prostituted to his private purposes, however vengeful and hurtful to good morals. I did oppose Comstock's application for membership in the order of Freemasons for good and sufficient reasons. Mr. Britton said that if he was rejected now he would propose him in his lodge, Americus, where he knew he would be accepted without a word of objection. It is hoped that Americus lodge will be able to act on the merits of the case if it ever comes before it. A. L. RAWSON.

Phonography Taught by Mail.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Quite a number of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav applied to me to know if I can teach them phonography without their coming to New York. Please let me reply to all that I can teach by mail, but it is not the best way. It is more laborious to me, as I hav to teach by writing, which is work, instead of by word of mouth, which is also work, but not so slow and hard work. I hav to charge just as much per lesson; but the pupil, if he succeeds, saves the expense of a journey and living in New York. The difficulty in teaching by mail is to convey sounds on paper, through the eye, to the ear of the pupil. It is not easy in that way to explain and convey sounds which nature intended to be addressed by the tongue directly to the ear. But by various illustrations and devices it can be done, particularly if the pupil has had such training in the analysis of language into its elements as he ought to hav had, but seldom gets, at school. And pupils who wish to avail themselvs of that method may send me $10, and I will write them ten letters of instruction. This may be a trial course, and the pupil can then decide whether he has the taste, qualification, and determination to go on with it.

In my recent statement on the subject I meant to interest those young men and women who are seeking a trade or looking out for a profession, and who are able and willing to pay for rapid and thorough work, just as they would go to a university to study law or medicin or theology in order to work at it and get a living by it. A few such hav applied, and I think I shall hav some pupils around me. T. C. LELAND.

Creation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Is it not requisit that all reformers should be philosophers? If so, why not become philologists as well, and coin new words with new meanings, so as to hav them correspond to facts? Or else let us giv new meanings to old ones, so that truth may not be lost in theological fog.

The meaning of the word create is usually supposed to be a process of making something out of nothing by the fiat of infinit power. Agreeable to natural philosophy and good sense, this is not and never was true. Yet in the above sense it is very commonly used both by the learned and unlearned. And, when so used, is constantly misleading the common thoughts of mankind, and thereby stultifies their better judgment. At least this is too true of those who only look to pulpitarians for their philosophy and the meaning of words.

Should a TRUTH SEEKER say to persons thus educated from infancy to manhood through all the grades of popular theology, from the Sunday-school up to the Moody and Sankey college, that God never created anything, would it not sound to them extremely horrible, yea, blasphemous?

Yet a little rational thinking should convince any one that nothing, in an absolute sense, can ever be created or made into a positiv something, because true philosophy rationally affirms that whatever something that now is always was in some mode or form of existence.

If a new meaning, then, can be given to the word create, so as to signify a process of unfoldment, a development of something tangible from out of something intangible, from ever-existing or self-existent substance, then could reformers and all others use the word conscientiously.

But this new meaning would so spoil old theology that it will doubtless take precious time to establish it in the present Christian (pagan) literature.

That class of writers known as Spiritualists, in order to correct the common thought or false meaning of the word create, are using others in its place which more truly correspond with philosophic facts. Such, for instance, as evolve, unfold, develop, or to individualize, identify, or make manifest, all signifying the various processes by which the self-existent invisible becomes manifest through the tangible, the visible; or, as Swedenborg would affirm under his law of correspondences, that everything visible is from necessity correspondential to something invisible, which is the real of all visible or tangible things, for what is a cathedral in Rome but human thoughts developed into structure, made visible?

Should THE TRUTH SEEKER writers drop the word create entirely, it would be of no loss to thinkers, but be of much benefit to Abraham Lincoln "plain people," and especially to the non-progressiv priesthood in all lands. DR. E. B. WHEELOCK.

A Relic of Voltaire's.

Voltaire died May 30, 1778. Would it be fair to say that the world has arrived at its final opinion of the man? The majority of those who care for the most remarkable of all eighteenth-century Frenchmen is divided into a small group of ardent defenders and a whole army of critics. The defenders are mostly Parisians; they are joined by some French provincials and a remarkably small number of foreigners. It is perhaps not strange that Voltaire has more admirers in Spain and Italy than in Germany, England, and the United States; but it is curious that so many writers of the Germanic family should look upon Voltaire as a man to-be criticised and condemned rather than studied and understood. And yet the world owes Voltaire cool justice. The fact that the very name of Voltaire is still strong enough to excite opposition and sneers illustrates the power of the man without any reference to the question whether he used his talents in the right cause or not. The man whose mere name excites opposition after a hundred years must hav been at least a great force while he lived. Or has he acquired the fame of the destroyer only?

Perhaps the fairest and coolest estimate of the man Voltaire has been formed by a few exceptional Germans and Englishmen, and Strauss may be mentioned as the type of this very limited class. But the final verdict is yet to be pronounced. And it is reasonable to assume that Voltaire's private papers will throw some new light upon his character and the history of his mind. Meanwhile history teaches beyond much doubt that Voltaire was the most influential Frenchman of the last century, and that he has caused more than any other man a redistribution of authority in French matters. In matters of faith and taste he represented the opposition, and the opposition has been successful if not triumphant. Voltaire represents far more than did Rousseau the spirit of advanced and elegant society such as existed in France up to 1789. The Girondists followed Voltaire, while Rousseau is the first of the Montagnards. It is certain, nevertheless, that Voltaire's philosophy cannot compete with earlier and later rivals, and that his opinions on Shakspere as well as ancient art hav been overruled. At the same time he was as much as any one man can be the creator of the eighteenth century, its shallowness included. As a figure in history he will always be prominent, and in the history of his time and country he is properly regarded as the most prominent figure of all.

When Voltaire died, his private papers and manuscripts went, together with his library, into the imperial palace at St. Petersburg. Both were deposited in the Hermitage which the Empress Catharine had added to the Winter Palace for herself and her special friends. The same woman purchased the libraries of Diderot and D'Alembert, the pictures once owned by Bruhl, Choiseuil, and Baron Crozat, and a part of the famous collections at Houghton Hall. But the Emperor Nicholas hated Catharine almost as much as he detested Voltaire, and if one of the Voltaire manuscripts has now been printed, no one owes Nicholas any thanks therefor. About thirty-five years ago Leonzon Leduc, a French scholar, was very anxious to see Voltaire's "Sottisier." After much trouble he received permission to read the manuscript. He was not allowed to copy it, and four soldiers saw to it that Leduc obeyed orders. But another man had copied the work, Rostopshin, and he is the same man who defended Moscow against Napoleon by burning it. Rostopshin copied the "Sottisier" in order to prove Voltaire's wickedness. By an accident Leduc has recently obtained this copy, and has printed a small edition of it for the use of his friends. The "Sottisier" contains Voltaire's memoranda, little notes and comments, and a sort of literary diary. Most of the entries make but a sentence or short paragraph each, and their value seems to consist chiefly in showing the growth of ideas in Voltaire's mind.

Rostopshin wanted to prove with the help of the "Sottisier" that Voltaire was credulous, ignorant, and bad. Leduc venerates the memory of Voltaire. But he is right in not throwing the book upon the market, for it would certainly not add to Voltaire's reputation, while it helps to explain the operation of his mind. Some of the most famous utterances in the Essai sur les Moeurs and the Siecle de Louis XIV. appear in the "Sottisier" for the first time, either in a rudimentary form or not disguised under polite phraseology. Thus Richelieu is spoken of with bitter hatred, and the French nation is criticised quite freely. Optimism is ridiculed, and satire coupled with French esprit pervades most entries. Thus Maintenon is made to say to Louis XIV., "Je lui parlais du diable; il eut peur—Je suis reine."

The pope is described as a man whose hands are tied, and whose feet are kissed. An aristocratic woman is made to say that God will think twice before he condemns a great lady such as she is. Here is a good aphorism, "Words are to thoughts what gold is to diamonds; thoughts and diamonds need setting, but not much." At another place he concludes that most people must be physicians, because they inquire after his health. Suddenly he complains that Frenchmen and Italians use too many superlativs, and adds, "The English approach the Romans in this matter; they reason, we talk." The memoranda of Schiller, Becthoven, and some English celebrities hav been published. Those of Goethe are still kept at Weimar, and Voltaire's are, most of them, hiden at St. Petersburg. The one relic of him now published proves him to hav been consistent and honest. Just before his death he wrote, "I am about to die; I worship God, I love my friends, I do not hate my enemies, and I abhor superstition."

Origin of the Species.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The theory of some naturalists that each species of both the vegetable and animal kingdoms had a single origin in a certain locality, and by various means hav been distributed over all parts of the world, where they would flourish, I most emphatically denounce. That it is more reasonable they should originate in one place than another, where latitude and climate are conduciv to their growth, I cannot understand.

The object of this earth, as well as all other planets, is for the satisfaction of living creatures and intellectual beings. As a necessity to the subsistence of animated creatures, vegetation was the first product of the earth, and doubtless the polar regions were first to be clothed in verdure, as by the cooling process that locality would first be in a condition for the germination of vegetation. By the wear of time the internal heat of the earth gradually subsides, the crust extends deeper, and the surface becomes colder; and torrid regions, the last to develop, are now most luxuriant, while frigid countries are so devoid of caloric as to allow scarcely any vegetation to grow and mature.

Now the principles of all the species, both of vegetation and animation, existed in the earth before any development of them took place; and by the natural forces, through fixed laws in nature, the earth brought forth the necessary means for the support of centralized spiritual identities. Nature, then, through infinit intelligence and perfect laws, developed a low order of animation directly from vegetable growth. These various species of animated nature, through successiv generations of amalgamativ progress, hav developed into higher orders, and man, the great acme of all spirit life in earthly tenement, is the grand result.

Before animated nature was developed on earth, the earth herself, a living, moving, and thinking being, possessed within herself all the constituents, when fertilized by the sun's warmth and light, of both the vegetable and animal kingdoms; and her most productiv age in the germination of the species was when her internal heat produced the most activ operations with her electric forces, as the true principles for a nucleus germ existed in the earth everywhere by the action of the elements, not in the form of a centralized seed.

All productions are natural to their latitudes and climates, and what will spontaneously flourish in any locality would originate from the natural forces operating in the earth at that period when her conditions were adapted to such developments.

I would state that Darwin and others hav devoted pages and chapters to the distribution of the species, presupposing that they all originated in one place, and even mention chunks of wood with accidental seeds upon them as having floated three thousand miles on salt water, and pigeons with seeds mixed with the occasional dirt upon their feet, whereby, in their migrations, they hav helped to seed the continents and islands of the earth.

But such means are unnatural, unnecessary, and inconsistent, as no lands hav ever yet been discovered without their natural vegetation and animation existing upon them.

It is natural for certain productions to originate spontaneously from the soil at the present time. In this region, where pine forests abound, and in places where scarcely a tree or bush can be found, except pine, when the pine is lumbered off not a pine growth anew will appear, but seemingly that element is exhausted. Oak, the natural successor, will appear in hundreds of tiny shoots per acre during the first summer that the ground is not shaded, and no parent root or acorn can be found from which they grow. Anti-Monopoly in the Light of Philanthropy and Sociology.

ADDRESS BY COURTLANDT PALMER BEFORE THE NATIONAL ANTI-MONOPOLY LEAGUE, WEDNESDAY EVENING, FEB. 16, 1881.

GENTLEMEN: My memory loves to linger upon the strong but kindly features of a man now dead, who in early youth renounced his scant inheritance in favor of his needier sisters, and who, the railroad being then unknown, journeyed by sloop to New York, which was at that time scarcely more than a good-sized town. His whole financial capital was summed up in the traditional shilling. Employed as clerk, which in those days meant porter too, he labored morning, noon, and night. By dint of honesty, economy, and industry he worked his way from employee to master, from poverty to wealth.

That man was my father, and you will all recall some parallel to him, for my description only presents the portrait of our model American man of business.

And how can we fail to admire the shrewdness, sturdy pluck, and tireless perseverance of such a character, which, amid the fierce struggles of trade, enables a man like this to distance his competitors and wrest success from the very jaws of opposition?

It is the picture of individual enterprise upon its better side, and this same individual enterprise it is which, by its inherent energy and push, has done more than aught else to build up our national commerce and raise our country to its present hight of material renown, and which, by extending and strengthening itself through corporate combinations, has given us all those wonderful developments we daily see in the departments of banking, insurance, telegraphy, and transportion, not to mention many other similar mammoth growths of trade.

But now the question comes, How far may this individual enterprise be legitimately carried? How far may the few go on appropriating to their own behoof the great powers of steam and electricity, the soil, and all the other great facilities for production and exchange which natural and human justice declares should be free to all? For, brought to its extremest ultimate, this process could only mean that a few great financial potentates or incorporated companies would own the whole of our great planet while all earth's citizens would be their moneyed slaves.

This, of course, sounds like exaggeration; but is it so very wide of the mark, in view of what your admirable address to the people says on page fifteen, where, in speaking of the state of California, it remarks as follows?

> "There monopoly is king. There a few men control steam transportation. They hav annihilated competition. There is not a farmer, not a producer, between the mountains and the Pacific who does not pay them heavier tribute than conquered people ever paid to their conquerors. They fix the value of the farm, the mine, the mill, and the forest. They decide year by year whether the producer shall make a profit or a loss; whether his children shall travel toward the academy or the poorhouse. They name senators and judges. They hav their candidate for the presidency. They hav bound the prosperity of California in fetters of iron as fatal as death, as unyielding as the grave."

But all this evil, you may affirm, is the result only of the abuses this League wishes to correct, such as freight discriminations, watering of stock, corrupt control of legislation, etc., etc., all of which it is your present aim to remedy by means of proper laws; and just as our governments hav a right to regulate the rate of interest for the people's good, so also, you maintain, statutes may be ordained restrictiv of those men "who recognize no responsibility but to their stockholders, and no principle of action but personal and corporate aggrandizment." To this most worthy aim I say Amen, for great would be the good accomplished by such reforms.

But suppose these objects attained, will the purposes of this League hav been effected? To which I answer, in a measure, Yes, but to a great extent, No, for as long as gigantic public enterprises like our railroad and telegraph systems are privately controled there must be warfare between the private interests of the stockholders and the public interests of the people, and even under the best of regulation laws, when best administered, we should still see the few swollen plutocrats amassing their profits from the unjust tax they levy on the public; since, even so restricted, their powers become too great to admit of opposition, and all competition starts handicapped against them.

What, then, are the purposes of this League?

It thus announces two of its fundamental principles: "We advocate and will support and defend the rights of the many as against the privileges of the few;" and "corporations, the creation of the state, shall be controled by the state."

To make the first of these statements consistent with the second it seems to me that the second must be thus amended, to wit, "Corporations, the creation of the state, shall be controled by the state; and when inflated to such magnitude that they become co-extensiv with the governmental domain itself, then they shall be bought, owned, and managed by that government." Otherwise, in my estimation, the rights of the many will never be maintained as against the privileges of the few. This is the only real solution of the question I can see, and is at once confirmed by a comparison of our people's post-office with the Western Union telegraph consolidation, the first of which sends a letter from New York to San Francisco for three cents, the second a telegram of ten words for two dollars.

The very principle that this League enunciates brings us face to face with the hard problem of individual versus social rights of the old political economy based on self-interest versus the new political economy founded on a higher view of man as a social being and vested with social rights and duties.

The undeniable fact is that labor, acting upon the free gifts and forces of nature, is the source of all wealth, and it is equally true that labor does not reap its equitable share of the rewards. Through the squeezing-out process of competition the stronger are yearly working toward the top, the weaker toward the bottom; the rich are growing richer, the poor poorer, and instead of a just distribution of earth's products we find the meanest of all mean power concentrating itself in the hands of the few, viz., the power of irresponsible wealth. Our banking, insurance, telegraph, and railroad companies, our great business houses, such as dry goods, groceries, etc., etc., and even the control of real estate, are, or are becoming, thus monopolized, and such a thing as free competion practically exists no more. Against these overpowering agglomerations any new man enters the race so weighted down that victory is next to impossible. For a few years many such tyros may struggle on till one of our decennial money panics flings up its turbid waves and engulfs them while their cargoes are landed on the decks of their more powerful rivals, who, by their superior strength, are enabled not only to outride the storm, but gather in the spoils the feebler ones hav lost.

And thus we are brought not only to a consideration of the injustice inherent in this system, but also to a view of its danger. Injustice is always dangerous. It was Louis XIV. who, in the arrogance of his belief in the divine right of kings, exclaimed, "L'etat, c'est moi," "the state, it is I," and that expression, or the idea involved in it, was the precursor and gave the impulse to the French Revolution, and I would warn those who to-day are reposing on the divine rights of property to take Thomas Carlyle from their libraries and read again his story of that world tragedy.

But, I now ask, Is there any way of escape from the maze of this dangerous public injustice? Is there any principle to show us (even though dimly) how to reconcile individual and social interests? For blot out individual enterprise, take away the spur of profit from industry, and you overturn our present civilization. Yet, on the other hand, the greed of gain must not become so great and grasping as to result in general wrong.

I think that science presents us with a solution of this vexed question, for which I am largely indebted to Herbert Spencer, whose little work called "The Study of Sociology," is now used as a text-book in Yale College. If you will turn to Part II. of his great work, entitled "The Principles of Sociology," you will there find chapter ii thus headed, "A Society is an Organism." I can only giv here the barest reference to his argument. He says that society is not a mere aggregate of separate individuals, which, like an audience in a theater, disperses when the play is over and exists no longer, but rather is a living organism, analogous in many respects to the human body itself. For instance, the human body grows. So does a society. Again, one body, taking its conception as its date of birth, undergoes great changes of structure and function; so too does a society in the course of its evolution, as witness how in early stages of culture each man is his own farmer, toolmaker, merchant, etc., etc., but how, as time goes on, vast divisions of labor and occupation occur, by means of which commerce, manufactures, the arts, education, and all the departments of life become assigned to their respectiv workers.

But Spencer's third reason (and the last I here cite) why society is an organism is the one that for us is most in point, viz., that as in the human body, so in the social body there exists mutuality of dependence between the parts as among each other and also between the parts and the whole; and thus the more humanity develops the more interdependent and unified its many classes become, till, as Carlyle says, an Indian can't quarrel with his squaw on the lakes of Maine without producing a rise in the price of furs in London. To harmonize as well as may be such vast relationships it is that governments arise. Their purpose is to act as the balance-wheel to the general clock-work and make it all keep time.

Now all this solidarity of interests has always been more or less clearly perceived in the past. It was shadowed forth in the old Roman fable of the Bells and the Members. St. Paul said that "no man liveth to himself," and that we are all "members one of another;" and we ourselvs are accustomed to speak of society as the body politic, and we refer to the life of a nation in pretty much the same terms as we do to the life of a man. But still, I believe that never has the destinction and relations between the individual and social organisms (with all the important consequences involved) been scientifically formulated till modern sociology took hold of the question.

Well, gentlemen, if these two organisms exist, the individual and social, the simple deduction is that we hav not only the one but the other also to consider and provide for. Society is a life. Just as the cells of our bodies combine to form our individual organisms, so do we, men and women, unite as living molecules, to constitute the larger life of society. When our frames are in a healthy condition the blood courses along, carrying its vital supplies to all the organs—a congestion anywhere causes suffering everywhere—and so it is with the social organism. Repletion in one class means starvation in another and general distress and discontent.

And further, if the last reason I quoted from Spencer (showing why society is an organism) is true, and true it undoubtedly is, then in the earthly and human sense we must affirm that in and by this larger organism we, as individuals, actually liv and move and hav our being. Without its toil and providence we could not liv a day. I cannot do better on this point than to cite the words of the venerable Peter Cooper, whom the Sun newspaper justly calls New York's greatest citizen. They are taken from an address delivered by him in this building, May 31, 1871: "I cannot," he says, "shut my eyes to the fact that the production of wealth is not the work of any one man, and the acquisition of great fortunes is not possible without the co-operation of multitudes of men; and that, therefore, the individuals to whose lot these fortunes fall, whether by inheritance or the laws of production and trade, should never lose sight of the fact that as they only hold them by the will of society, expressed in statute law, so they should administer them as trustees for the benefit of society, as inculcated by the moral law."

Here, then, from the mouth of this aged and philanthropic sage, whose faith is proven by his works, we find one of the solutions of the problem of wealth in its individual and social aspects. The view he takes is merely a transplantation of the old Christian doctrin that as we derive all from God, so we owe all to him, and are stewards of his bounty.

Mr. Cooper, while so believing, reduces this dogma to a more practical shape by affirming that private wealth, being the product of human society, must be held by the rich in trust for society.

But the next inference to be drawn from our sociological doctrin is more immediately to the point on this occasion, and it simply is to the effect that when private enterprise so overleaps itself as to trench on what should be public enterprise, why, then the public or state must step in on fair terms, put the individuals out and put themselvs in. Our city, for instance, supplies Croton water at a nominal rate, while our gas companies (with several needless sets of gas mains) bleed us ad libitum. Our city runs its fire department, a company our "L" roads, and extending the illustration to the United States government, I cannot see why a nation which conducts its post-office and custom-house cannot also manage a national railroad and telegraph system, and also (which is even more needed in my estimation) a national (really national) banking.

Innumerable inferences might be drawn from our sociological law regarding humanity considered in its continuity and solidarity, for it means, in my view, the dawn of a new civilization; but confining myself to the question we are on, viz., of wealth and of its social nature, I may allude to the co-operativ stores of England, which hav been so successful there, and which Mr. A. R. Foote is endeavoring to introduce in this country, the purpose of which is to secure a fairer distribution of profits. Schultze Debtsch's schemes of banking and insurance in Germany are analogous efforts.

But you will again ask, "Is individualism to die out?" I answer, It cannot die out, for happily it is a law that as society becomes complex and cultured, the individual becomes more differentiated, more distinct, and more self-sovereign, but this can only be by a greater though freer subordination of the individual to society.

But in the present state of conflict between private and public claims, I can only see that it is the necessity and therefore the duty of each man to work ahead amid sharp competitions of life and gain what he reasonably can. He must, for self-protection and for the protection of his business, retain large reserves or else the next financial crisis will overwhelm him; and as the life is more than meat and the body than raiment, he is justified, as the meed of toil and honesty, to feed though not satiate his soul on art, love, and beauty.

But, on the other hand, he must learn to recognize the social responsibilities of wealth. Though money-giving has its place, the day of mere dole and charity has passed away forever. We must effect improvements through change of systems, and not be content to compromise with our consciences by mere almsgiving; and while the large-hearted are making (as they must make) their gains under our present hard, competitiv system, they will seek to sustain and promote every endeavor which attempts to substitute for this Darwinism in trade those more beneficent ameliorations which can only come through co-operation, be that co-operation public or private in its nature.

This means the Christ spirit adapted and applied to the complex exigencies of our new age. It means the establishment among good men and true of a new chivalry founded not on war but on industry. It means one of the signs of the kingdom of heaven on earth; and may its coming not be too long delayed!

That Stolen Rib.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE LIBERAL CLUB BY E. BELLE WHITNEY.

MR. PRESIDENT, GENTLEMEN, AND LADIES: In submitting to your consideration the question, "Was the Removed Rib of Adam an Imperfect Bone?" I shall confine myself mainly to the Mosaic account of creation, as we and every child in Christendom are taught to read it and instructed to believe it to be divine revelation without question or query, and its consequent effect on woman.

A close economizer very seldom throws away or destroys that which can be conveniently utilized in molding into form the conception of the mind. If the material be valuable, every particle of waste or refuse is carefully collected and laid away until it shall be required.

In all formations the skilful artist takes the utmost care that the beauty, strength, and utility of the structure may meet the most perfect development of the original design. All dross adhering to gems or jewels is carefully removed. All metals used for machinery, every stick of timber, every block of marble used for the erection of houses, or the building of ships, are thoroughly inspected before being used. All fabrics must be free from flaw before being made into garments. All structures are formed of particles, pieces, or parts; and, to insure a perfect whole, every piece, particle, or part must blend in harmony with each other. Should the slightest flaw be discovered in any one piece, part, or particle, however small, the entire formation would be condemned as imperfect, and, if not removed, complete worthlessness would be the inevitable result. In conformity to this law of exactness, the artist plies his brush, the sculptor his chisel, the mechanic his tools, until the eye shall see in bold relief the grand reflection of the mental vision.

This same law, in which we see so much strength, beauty, and harmony, seems to hav been the governing principle of the creator in making man. According to the Mosaic account of that unique piece of work, the removal of a rib from the side of man, I claim, was because of some imperfection in the structure, and not for the purpose of affording material for the formation of woman, as all subsequent results conclusivly prove.

The making of the woman (for she was not like man created) seems to hav been an afterthought, for a certain purpose, as I shall endeavor to show.

The first chapter of Genesis informs us that after everything was made and pronounced good, God said, "Let us make man" in our own image.

The fifth chapter of Genesis givs more fully the particulars of the creation of man, and further informs us that God created nothing without a pre-existing motiv, as he givs a reason for the object of that creation. As an inevitable consequence attending all formations, the existence of one thing suggests the necessity of another. So after the world was made, the creator seems to hav discovered that some one was required to till the ground. At this discovery the narrativ states, "And the Lord God formed man out of the dust, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." And "God took the man and put him in the garden to dress it and keep it."

We see from this statement that the garden was intended to supply food, and the creator wisely adapted the man with a corresponding appetite. You may eat, says the creator, of every tree of the garden but one, and at the same time stated the penalty that would inevitably follow in consequence thereof. You will please bear in mind the woman is not yet made.

Subsequent to the final completion of man, and previous to the formation of woman, we may suppose the creator discovered some imperfection in the structure, and reasoned thus: My man does not come up to my expectations; some of the component parts of his make-up must be defectiv; a slight flaw somewhere; a little dross, probably, sticking about the jewel I meant should be as near like myself as possible.

Like a skilful artisan, the creator minutely examined his work, and, finding the difficulty, like a humane surgeon before submitting a subject to the knife, the Lord caused a deep sleep to fall on the man, and the Lord God took out one of his ribs and closed the flesh instead thereof.

In the side, then, which must hav presented paroxisms of distress, was the seat of all the trouble—the defectiv part. The dust, probably, had not been well refined, sifted, and purified. It may hav been taken from the base of some ant-hill, and one of those little busybodies stayed in the soft mold and worked its way to the side, and there lay tickling at the ribs.

The narrativ does not state, but another rib must hav been inserted to complete the symmetry of the formation. No builder would remove an imperfect piece from a construction and not insert another in its place, and surely we could not impute such want of judgment to the creator of man. If another rib had not been inserted, the structure would hav been incomplete; the perpendicular would not hav been plumb; man would hav been an unbalanced structure; his locomotion crab-like or sideways. The anatomy of man assures us that he is supplied with an equal number of ribs on each side, therefore another rib must hav been inserted before the first man could awake from his deep sleep a perfect image of God.

But what of the removed bone? It was a part of the material of which the semi-heavenly gem was composed, and could not be carelessly thrown away, notwithstanding its frailties.

Previous to the removal of the rib the creator discovered that the man required help. So the Lord God said (according to the biblical account), I will make him help. It is not good for him to be alone. Whatever induced the creator to make man help, or to discover he could not be alone, we cannot say. The Bible givs no clew beyond mere conjecture. The garden may hav been neglected, while the godly image looked lean and hungry and afraid to go around alone, consequently he required both help and protection. An opportunity was now offered for utilizing the removed rib. It could be made up into a servant for his image. It was just the thing for an inferior being. Like a close economizer, according to the Bible, which says, And the rib which the Lord God took from the man made he woman and brought here. From where, the Bible does not say. Probably from his shop or laboratory, or from some place where he had placed the rib for safe keeping, and "brought her to the man."

There must hav been some previous understanding between the creator and the man relativ to the removal of the rib and of utilizing it into help for him. For on being informed of the successful completion of the work of making the removed rib into help for him, Adam doubtless rubbed his eyes, yawned, rolled over, and taking a good look at the removed bone, now in the form of a living creature, all the previous distress, pain, trouble, and wretchedness she had caused him while she lay stowed away in his side, and the deep sleep necessary to fall on him for her removal flashed over his mind, for from the impulsiv suggestions of these recollections, he exclaimed, "You troublesome, condemned, accursed thing, bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh, thou shalt be called wo-man." In calling the removed rib, now in the form of a living being, man, the godly image deemed an explanation necessary. For, said he, she was taken out of man, the prefix explaining itself—troublesome, accursed, condemned man. The godly image, with a masterly instinct, at once passed the heavy part of the labor or work imposed on them over to her who was now his help, for said he, "Thou shalt be the mother of our race." The godly image had given birth to one and that quite satisfied him. For the advent of Eve endows man with the honor of being the first mother.

Everything made previous to the birth of woman was pronounced good by the creator, but with regard to the quality or intrinsic value of the being made of the removed rib he maintained a profound silence. He simply made her without the benediction of good or the assurance of possessing a soul, or of bearing any likeness to him, or of being his daughter. On the contrary, she is termed in holy writ as the daughter of man, produced of man and partaking only of the defects of his removed rib. The removed bone or rib, now an animated, self-motiv power, begins to fill her misssion as help or servant to feed the godly image, and while thus employed its imperfection begins to assert itself in a manner quite different from that which so disturbed the godly image before its removal from his side. Had it been left there the flaw would hav affected only the physical formation, and man ever remained in a delicate condition, or died at once with pleurisy or heart disease.

But in gathering the products of the garden to feed the man she seeks the society of beasts, reptils, and evil spirits, and holds familiar converse with them, and so delayed in preparing his repast that the man became so hungry he was glad to eat anything his servant set before him, without question, for the Bible says he ate the fruit she set before him and said it was good. And I hav no doubt that he smacked his lips and sent her for more.

Previous to the birth of man's help he must hav lain in the garden in the condition of many other species of new-born creatures, blind and helpless, until the magic smell of food opened his eyes. But it seems to hav been quite different with the removed rib, who must hav been made to see to enable her to perform the labor required of her as help. She was designed to trip about the garden, attend to its culture, gather in its products, and wait on the man, her master. For the Bible says that the woman saw that the tree was for food and pleasant to the eyes; therefore she, unlike the man, was made possessing sight.

It is quite important to observe that the command with regard to the forbidden tree was not given to the woman. What the creator had to say to his creatures was addressed to his son and not to his son's servant, nor did she receive any like command from her master. Her knowledge of the prohibition came directly from the serpent. Adam probably forgot to inform his help of the existence of this peculiar tree and of its deadly properties when he ordered her to gather fruit. The serpent seeing the woman employed in the garden opened the dialog in a familiar sort of banter thus, "God hath said ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden." The woman replied, "We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden." The keen reply proves conclusivly that the woman never before heard of the command. Doubting the serpent, and being ignorant of the locality of the prohibited tree and of its nature, she gathered its fruit and set it before her master. In this first act of duty the removed bone is accused of sending God's image on the double-quick down to perdition, an act so monstrous that nothing short of the sacrifice of his heavenly son could atone for it. But how, according to the Bible narrativ, we are at a loss to see.

It is an indisputable fact that when an accusation of guilt fastens itself on an individual, he is doomed to bear under suspicion all the misdemeanors of an entire community. Such was unfortunately the condition of the first woman. Being made of imperfect material she was already under suspicion, and readily supposed to be the only being capable of committing the first crime. So Adam complacently cleared himself when accused by the Creator by saying "I did not do it; it was my help you made for me out of that bad rib." In this very grave offense, so long charged to the woman, we can only see the imprefections of the removed rib displayed in a sort of careless indifference, a disregard of station, a disposition to gossip and loiter about, and so delayed her time, and then in presuming to eat before her master, which has ever been deemed a piece of impertinence in a servant. Even then there is some plausible excuse. She may hav been commanded by her master to taste of everything first, as security to his own safety, as everything was new and fresh, and having no knowledge of the poisoning properties of vegetation, and knowing, as Adam did, there existed a tree in the garden of a deadly nature; and the woman, being soulless, might gorge herself on the forbidden fruit free from its deadly effects.

Now let us see what this removed rib did that so annoyed heaven and distressed the world. What was her crime? She did not disobey her maker. He gave her no command; nor did she disobey his earthly image, nor did she heed the serpent. Then wherein did she err? In what was her sin and great crime? Let us turn to the third chapter of Genesis and see. "Because," says the creator to the man, "thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife, the help whom I gave thee"—there was the crime! The first sin ever committed was listening to the voice of a creature whom he knew to be constructed of condemned, rejected material, a being far below him in attributes or station. Throughout all history, both sacred and profane, we learn that there is nothing which so belittles a man as to listen to the voice of a woman or to be advised or ruled by her. It is a weak point in his composition, a crime that he sneaks and shames under as the consequent result of this Bible record supposed to be divine. The Bible, as I hav shown, declares that the first sin ever committed by man was "listening to the voice of a woman." All through the Bible man is warned against this great sin. St. Paul made it a special theme, and dwelt on its horrors with great anxiety. He charged the saints by no means to listen to their wives and their profanity. There is no crime mentioned in the Bible with more horrifying results. "For hearkening to the voice of thy wife," said the creator to the first man, "I will curse the ground, expel you from Eden, and from the sweat of your own brow shall you help yourself to your own bread." A great punishment for one made to be waited on by a servant. [CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

The Northern Wisconsin Spiritual Conference

Will hold its quarterly meeting March 11th, 12th, and 13th, at Omro, Wis. James Kay Applebee, of Chicago, who will be the principal speaker, is one of the most talented orators in the Freethought ranks. All lovers of truth are invited to be present and participate. The best vocal and instrumental music has been secured. Let all be present the first day of the meeting. Please notify the secretary of your intention of attending. Usual courtesies to all. Round trip tickets can be obtained.

What Objections to Christianity?

It is far from being improbable that the current story of Jesus was made up of legends and accounts by some person or persons who really lived not far from the time in which he is located. Most plausible and probable theories of this kind have been based upon certain facts that have been brought to light. Two or three years ago I had the honor of publishing a small work, translated from a Hebrew document, the little book being entitled "Sepher Toldoth Jeshu: The Book of the Generation of Jesus." The same also appears as an appendix to the work entitled "The Revelations of Antichrist." It is nothing less than a gospel believed to be older than those in the New Testament and thought to be the origin from whence the story was drawn. This singular production had been alluded to in somewhat disparaging terms by Lardner, Voltaire, Taylor, and others, most of whom regarded it as spurious, and consequently classed it among the many spurious gospels which appeared within the first three Christian centuries. The Rev. S. Baring-Gould, in his "Lost and Hostile Gospels," published in London not many years ago, has two versions of this "hostile gospel," which he translated from the original Hebrew. A friend of mine who has been studiously exploring all works treating upon the origin of Christianity was gratified to find a copy of Wagenseil's Tela Ignae Salanæ, published two hundred years ago, where he found this legendary gospel in Hebrew, with what he terms a rough Latin translation. He lost no time in rendering the Latin into English. This translation I published in 1878. Its hero, Jeshu, was born 106 B.C., being the son of a betrothed maiden, Miriam (Mary), by Joseph Pandera, an adventurer. By the power of a charm stolen from the holy of holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles; wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrim stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandria, about seventy-five years before our era.

Without stopping to quote any of this older gospel, or to examine the probabilities of the story, it cannot be denied that the narrative is equally as consistent, equally as well-sustained, as is the story of Jesus. If the one is true it is undoubtedly the basis of the other, or even if it is untrue it may have served as the basis of another fiction. This basing one fiction upon another cannot possibly add anything to the truth of the second production. That the gospel of Jeshu is older than either of the gospels of Jesus there is good ground for believing, and that the older story could have been taken for the foundation of the newer story or version is not difficult to understand. I will, if you desire, in my next give you quotations from this gospel of Jeshu to enable you to see how like it are many passages in the accepted gospels of the New Testament.

Not to attempt to give all the possible sources whence the stories and legends of Jesus and the doctrines of Christianity might hav been drawn; not to follow the ideal speculations of Strauss, in which he arrives at the conclusion that the Christ of the Christian story is a myth; not to accompany Renan in his romantic "Life of Jesus" and his more realistic arguments and conclusions as to the existence of such a personage as Jesus, I will briefiy allude to a somewhat remarkable work published within the past year by Reeves & Turner, 186 Strand, London, entitled "The Jesus of History and the Jesus of Tradition Identified." The author of this work is Geo. Solomon, an educated and wealthy Hebrew of the island of Jamaica, and who also holds an official position under the British government. By making copious quotations from Josephus he shows rather conclusively that the story of Jesus as given by the four evangelists is of a mythical character made up of two or three real personages who had an actual existence about the time that Josephus wrote. The first was a fanatic or insane person named Jesus, who for seven years and a half roved about the country near Jerusalem, often visiting the city, and who claimed to be a prophet, constantly crying, "Woe, woe to Jerusalem!" He was a meek, harmless fellow, without followers or influence. He pursued no means of livelihood, and when he was offered food by those who took pity on him he partook of it but returned no thanks. He pronounced woe upon the Roman oppressors of the country, and was brought before Pilate and sentenced to a most severe scourging, in the execution of which his bones were even laid bare. He still, however, kept up his cry of "Woe," and when questioned as to who he was, whence he came, etc., his only words were, "Woe, woe!" Finally in his wanderings and ravings he cried, "Woe to myself also;" and at that moment a stone was thrown from one of the engines and struck him, and he fell dead.

Another was Judas of Galilee, who taught new doctrines, and who had a band of followers composed of fishermen and sailors, among whom were two named Simon and John. This Judas, whose name seemed afterward to be changed to Jesus, though a man of considerable force of character, was not noted for his good deeds. His career was at the time when Josephus was governor of Galilee, against whom this Judas, or Jesus, strongly protested, and against whom he strove to stir up the populace. In the words of Josephus, "he took the laws of Moses into his hands, and came into the midst of the people, and said, 'O my fellow-citizens, if you are not disposed to hate Josephus on your own account, have regard however to the laws of you country, which your commander-in-chief is going to betray; hate him therefore on both these accounts, and bring the man who has acted thus insolently to his deserved punishment." By the shrewdness of Josephus and the treachery on the part of the followers of Judas, or Jesus, who betrayed him, he was brought into the presence and power of the governor, who rebuked him for his mischievous and wicked conduct, and finally set him at liberty. This Judas, or Jesus, was said to be the founder of a new religion, and a sect of considerable numbers was the result.

Josephus describes these characters with considerable minuteness. He gives full details of various religious sects which existed in the country, but has not a word to say about the Jesus of gospel story or the system of religion which it is claimed he established. This is a very damaging fact for the credibility of Christian claims. Josephus was a profuse writer, who entered minutely into the history of every principal personage, and particularly of the many religious sects which existed at the time he lived and previously; and to have said not a word about such a remarkable character as Jesus Christ is said to be, who performed such wonderful miracles, though he lived amidst those who must have seen and known Jesus if he really existed at the time claimed, amounts to almost proof positive that no such personage had an actual existence.

The same remarks will also apply to Philo, another learned and profuse writer and historian, who lived at Alexandria, Egypt, at a somewhat earlier date. Though he wrote of many of the religious sects which abounded at his time, he had nothing to say of Jesus Christ, and nothing to say of Christians, his followers.

The spurious passage interpolated into the writings of Josephus recognizing Jesus and his divine character reads as follows: "Now there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles. He was (the) Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again on the third day; as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him. And the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day."

This is now pronounced on nearly all hands a clumsy and barefaced imposition. The grounds upon which the spuriousness of the passage is based are numerous and are acquiesced in by critics of nearly all shades of opinion.

1. It is a gratuitous and unnecessary interruption of the stream of the narrative, and has no connection with the paragraphs which precede or follow.

2. It is out of place and not in Josephus' manner to make mention of the Christian "tribe" as "not extinct at this day" in a paragraph referring to the time of Pilate's procuratorship, when, according to the testimony of the New Testament writers, the name and sect did not then exist.

3. In no case would Josephus denominate the Christian sect a "tribe." He would have called them a sect as he did other sects of which he wrote.

4. An orthodox Jew, loyal to his religion, as was Josephus, would never speak of a heretic or one who was endeavoring to establish a new and opposing system of religion as "the Christ," and assert of him that he had risen from the dead after having been in his grave three days. That passage was undoubtedly written by a believer in Jesus or one who wished to establish that belief.

5. That Josephus should have mentioned none of the "ten thousand wonderful things concerning him," instead of turning them off in that wholesale, slipshod manner.

6. While he mentions with particularity the other fanatic, insane Jesus being brought before Pilate he has nothing to say about the gospel Jesus when treated in the same manner.

7. That inasmuch as when Josephus described the new religion of Judas or Jesus of Galilee he expressly asserted that no other arose in that time.

8. When Josephus accounted for the obstinacy of the Jews at the siege of Jerusalem by reference to a widespread expectation that a messiah was coming, he had nothing at all to say of a messiah having then already come and risen from the dead, "as the divine prophets had foretold." If it was Josephus who wrote the spurious passage recognizing Jesus as the promised messiah he would assuredly have referred to him again when the subject of a looked-for messiah was on hand, and he would have had far more to say of him on other occasions.

The perpetrator of this forgery or pious fraud undoubtedly realized the necessity of some confirmation from the pen of a contemporary historian of the wonderful events in the story of the traditional Jesus, and without thinking of the awkward fact that Josephus had described with precision a far more insignificant prophet and never mentioned Jesus of Nazareth, he lugged in the spurious passage. Perhaps in his estimation the fact that while the historian had described the religious sects that had existed for more than half a century after Pilate's recall, they said nothing whatever of the Christians, thereby tacitly asserting their non-existence, justified his inserting the foregoing passage to remedy the evil and cause the gospel story to be more credible in the eyes of the world.

To the ecclesiastical but dishonest Eusebius, who flourished in the fore part of the fourth century, has been credited the making of this forged interpolation, as he is the first one who ever alluded to it. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and others of the earlier Christian Fathers would assuredly have noticed it and called attention to it had it been in existence in their day, but as it had not been written they are very excusable for not quoting it or saying a word about it. When it is remembered how easy it was in that age of the world for interested men and copyists to change manuscripts and make interpolations as necessity seemed to dictate, it cannot be wondered at that an unscrupulous partisan like Eusebius should yield to the temptation in that direction.

ANOTHER GLANCE AT ANCIENT FAITHS.

I will not stop here to examine into the various theories that have been devised to make clear the intricate muddle which invests the story of Jesus and the early period of church history, nor attempt to decide which is the most probable solution that has been advanced of that of which there is no historical proof, but before leaving the subject will take another brief view of the more ancient religions of the world.

As far back in antiquity as the religion and history of the Asiatic nations extend, it is claimed in certain quarters that Druidism is a still older system. In the most ancient Vedic hymns, and in other of the sacred literature of the Aryan race, allusion is made to a "White Isle" in the north-west, whence emigrated the people who brought civilization and the knowledge of the true God unto the Aryan country, and who established there the religion which for thousands of years has since been active. This White Isle is held by the advocates of ancient Druidism to be the isle of Britain, and that the people and religion of that portion of Europe are even older than those of central and southern Asia.

Within the last few days I had an interview with an educated Welshman who is well versed in ancient Welsh literature and the traditions of the ancient Druids, and he informs me that they have in the Welsh language a large amount of information respecting the belief, rites, and history of the ancient Bards and Druids which has never been published in English but is now being translated into our language. He informed me that he had witnessed excavations in Wales where the bones of human beings, accompanied by flint knives and implements, had been found side by side with the bones of tigers and elephants, which animals have not been known to exist in those high latitudes within the historic period, and probably not for fifty thousand years before. There was doubtless a time when Great Britain was warm enough to be inhabited by the animals of the tropics, but it was long, long, long ago.

The religious belief of the ancient Druids was a pure nature-worship, the sun, light, and air being personified in their creed in one supreme being, OM, by the Hindoos later written AUM, and by some of the Semitic races, EOA, Ioa, Jah, Jehovah; by the Grecians and Romans, Jove, etc. The Druids were proficient astronomers, and the heavenly bodies attracted a large share of their attention. The twelve signs of the zodiac were with them a sacred number. Twelve bards met together in their sacred groves around a holy rocking stone to consider matters pertaining to the public, and this was the origin of trial by jury.

They used many symbols indicative of their religious tenets and observances, and among these were the sacred circle representing eternity and the Infinite. These Druid circles were found within the past year engraved in stone on the highest points of the Pyrenees mountains; and Schleimann, in his excavations at the ancient city of Troy, found in his continuous digging, seven cities, one below the other, and in the lowest he found the Druidic symbols as clearly defined as they are found in Wales, and it is estimated that that lower city of Troy must be not less than one hundred thousand years old. From three to five thousand years ago the Druids occupied Gaul, Iberia, Germania, and Scandinavia, as well as Britain, Caledonia, and Hibernia. The Scandinavians were brothers of the Druids, and their systems of religion or mythology were of a similar character. The worship of the Allfather, a personification of the sun, was much like the worship of the Druids in their adoration of the great orb of day.

The Druids hold that the ancient Vedic hymns are Druidic, that the Institutes of Menu were the same, that Menu or the first man is the same as the original man which they believed in. The similarity of the symbols used by both the Druids and the ancient Hindoos are made alike, including the figure of the cross, which was originally as symbol of the male organs of generation, the creative or procreative powers. The round towers, steeples, and obelisks were first used with the same view and were more or less common in all the ancient nations.

The resemblance between the Druidic religion and that of Zoroaster in Iran or ancient Persia is most marked. Both worshiped one main and supreme creator. Both bowed down to the sun as his visible and active representative. Both worshiped in temples and at altars on the highest eminences or mountains; both were controlled by the same astronomical ideas, including the movements of the sun in his yearly course; both made much of the signs of the zodiac, precessions of the equinoxes, etc.; the principal gods of both had sons, the Druids Hu, or Hesus, and the Persian Mithra; both these were Redeemers and Mediators; both had their annual Christmas holidays and festivals on the twenty-fifth of December, when the sun, after its burial of three days at his lowest declension, began to rise and dispense light, life, vegetation, joy, and happiness over the whole face of the earth. The festival was kept in both countries with the greatest pomp, display, and magnificence, the sun receiving their highest adoration with music and many demonstrations of gladness and gratitude. Both believed in the existence of a supreme evil being who dwelt in the dark regions under the earth, where bad men and women were compelled to take up their residence at the close of life; both believed in angels and demons, and both in states of happiness and unhappiness beyond the grave.

It was the same with the Egyptians. They were like the Druids in their adoration of the powers and forces of nature. Both regarded the sun as the highest object of worship, and, in his different positions, as morning, noon, evening, night, personified him by their different gods and symbols. The Egyptians also held in full the conception of the celestial virgin and child, and these were objects of their highest worship.

The Druids claim that Pythagoras taught their doctrines and was in reality a high Druidic bard or priest. They insist that everything he taught was Druidic, even to the doctrine of metempsychosis, which was common to both. They claim the same also of Plato; that his philosophy and belief in the immortality of the soul was Druidistic in its strictest sense. The same were the fundamental ideas of the Grecian and Roman religions, though many corruptions crept in through the passions and ignorance of men.

They also hold that Judaism is nothing more than a distorted and corrupt form of Druidism; that the table of laws, communings with God, sacrifices to him, the tabernacle, and holy of holies, were much the same in both.

I do not undertake to say that the claims of the Druids are all well founded, that their religion or nationality is more ancient than that of the oriental nations, but that it may all be so I will not undertake to dispute, and they claim to have philological and other proofs to confirm it. Whether the Aryans of Central Asia are more or less ancient than the Druids, this truth is indisputable: that they have a great antiquity, far greater than that which Christianity can boast. When Julius Cæsar visited Britain, before the Christian era, he found the Druid worship in full power in what are now the British Isles, and found that it was a very ancient system and had been in vogue for an unknown length of time, and they had then begun to fall into decay. They were subjected to the greatest cruelty and persecution by Cæsar, and also by some of the subsequent kings of England. The most urgent and cruel means were devised to exterminate the bards and their system of worship. They were driven into the mountains and caverns, they were forced to change their written language to enable them to keep their records, and they had to use the utmost secrecy and caution to preserve their sacred ceremonies and forms of worship.

They have left many monuments behind them in various parts of Britain and France to prove their great antiquity and the earnestness and intensity of their religious faith. At Stonehenge, it is thought, was the cathedral of the Arch-Druid of Britain; and Avebury, with its avenues, was originally constructed in the form of a circle, with a serpent attached to it, the circle, be it remembered, being used as a symbol of the Supreme Being, and the serpent of the Divine Son. The ruins of a single temple are said to cover twenty-two acres.

To return for a moment to the religions of Asia, I will remark that it is hardly worth while for you to attempt to deny the existence of Buddha, or at all events, the belief in him, and that he was believed to have lived not less than five hundred and fifty years before the Christian era. In fact, this is the date upon which nearly all authors agree in fixing the time of his birth. I do not remember of consulting a single cyclopedia or other authority which sets his date at a later period than 540 B.C. As to the manner of his conception and entrance into the world, as believed in by his numerous followers, a short quotation from Arnold's beautiful "Light of Asia" will suffice to show:

The scripture of the savior of the world,
Lord Buddha—Prince Saddartha styled on earth—
In earth and heavens and hells incomparable,
All honored, wisest best, most pitiful;
The teacher of Nirvana and the law.

Thus came he to be born again for men:

Below the highest sphere four regents sit
Who rule our world, and under them are zones
Nearer, but high, where saintliest spirits dead
Wait thrice ten thousand years, then liv again;
And on Lord Buddha, waiting in that sky,
Came for our sakes the five sure signs of birth,
So that the devas knew the signs, and said,
"Buddha will go again to help the world."
"Yea," spake he; "now I go to help the world
This last of many times; for birth and death
End hence for me and those who learn my law.
I will go down among the Sakyas,
Under the southward snows of Himalay,
Where pious people liv, and a just king."
That night the wife of King Suddhodana,
Maya, the queen, asleep beside her lord,
Dreamed a strange dream; dreamed that a star from heaven—
Splendid, six-rayed, in color rosy-pearl,
Whereof the token was an elephant
Six tusked and whiter than Vahuka's milk—
Shot through the void, and, shining into her,
Entered her womb upon the right. Awaked,
Bliss beyond mortal mother's filled her breast,
And over half the earth a lovely light
Forewent the morn. The strong hills shook; the waves
Sank lulled; all flowers that blow by day came forth
As 'twere high noon; down to the farthest hells
Passed the queen's joy, as when warm sunshine thrills
Wood-glooms to gold, and into all the deeps
A tender whisper pierced. "O ye," it said,
"The dead that are to live, the live who die, Uprise, and hear and hope! Buddha is come."
Whereat in limbos numberless much peace
Spread, and the world's heart throbbed, and a wind blew
With unknown freshness over lands and seas.
And when the morning dawned, and this was told,
The gray dream-readers said: "The dream is good!
The crab is in conjunction with the sun;
The queen shall bear a boy, a holy child
Of wondrous wisdom, profiting all flesh,
Who shall deliver men from ignorance,
Or rule the world, if he will deign to rule."

In this wise was the holy Buddha born:

Queen Maya stood at noon, her days fulfilled,
Under a palsa in the palace grounds,
A stately trunk, straight as a temple-shaft,
With crown of glossy leaves and fragrant blooms;
And, knowing the time come, for all things knew—
The conscious tree bent down its boughs to make
A bower about Queen Maya's majesty;
And earth put forth a thousand sudden flowers
To spread a couch, while, ready for the bath,
The rock hard by gave out a limpid stream
Of crystal flow. So brought she forth her child
Pangless—he having on his perfect form
The marks thirty and two, of blessed birth;
Of which the great news to the palace came.
But when they brought the painted palanquin
To fetch him home, the bearers of the poles
Were the four regents of the earth, come down
From Mount Sumeru—they who write men's deeds
On brazen plates—the angel of the East,
Whose hosts are clad in silver robes, and bear
Targets of pearl; the angel of the South,
Whose horsemen, the Kumbhandas, ride blue steeds
With sapphire shields; the angel of the West,
By Nagas followed, riding steeds blood-red
With coral shields; the angel of the North,
Environed by his Yakshas, all in gold,
On yellow horses, bearing shields of gold.
These with their pomp invisible came down
And took the poles, in caste and outward garb
Like bearers, yet most mighty gods; and gods
Walked free with men that day; though men knew not:
For heaven was filled with gladness for earth's sake,
Knowing Lord Buddha thus was come again.

This beautiful description of Buddha's mission in the world and the great deeds he performed are thus continued to the extent of a volume, and I am sure no theologian, not excepting Calvin, Knox, and Edwards, with the poet Watts thrown in, has described the entrance and mission of Jesus in the world in more beautiful language, or dressed the crude conception in more fascinating colors. Matthew's and Luke's overshadowing stories certainly do not surpass it. Let me just give the closing lines of the grand poem:

Ah, blessed Lord! O High Deliverer!
Forgive this feeble script which doth thee wrong,
Measuring with little wit thy lofty love.
Ah! Lover! Brother! Guide! Lamp of the Law!
I take my refuge in thy name and thee!
I take my refuge in thy law of good!
I take my refuge in thy order! Om!
The dew is on the lotus! Rise great sun!
And lift my leaf and mix me with the wave
Om Mani Padme Hum! The sunrise comes!
The dewdrop slips into the shining sea!

Of course there is more poetry and imagination about this story of Buddha than real truth—more of the rich, oriental, ornamental word-painting than solid reality; but it is no better with the Jesus story. Of course I do not believe that Maya, the mother of Buddha, was impregnated by the ray of a star through the great efficacy of a dream, or that all nature bloomed, and that impossible horsemen and riders came forth at the moment of his birth, but it is just as true as that Mary was impregnated by a ghost, holy or unholy, and that angels came and sang to the shepherds on the occasion of the birth of Jesus, while watching their flocks in the fields in the month of December, and that a star should come down from the vaulted heavens, millions of miles away, to guide two or three old men to the manger or the cave where the little Jesus lay. There is any amount of absurdity and impossibility in both stories, but this has been the case in the inception of all religious systems, and it is just as true in one case as the other. The pious Buddhist implicitly believes the overshadowing story, and all the rest of it, about his Savior, fixed up for his acceptance, and the gullible Christian devotee easily swallows in the Jesus story of the miraculous conception, birth, singing in the clouds, miracles, death, resurrection, ascension up into the clouds, and everything else that inventive bishops and priests may have borrowed and written. This is the tribute to superstition that the devotee of every system of religion is expected to pay. But alas! the Christian is compelled to accept and believe the greatest absurdities of all, and he is forced to take it second-hand at that. The Buddha story certainly has one merit, if merit it may be called, and that is originality or priority. This the Jesus story assuredly has not. Buddha was before Jesus if morning is before noon. With all your twisting and ingenuity you cannot escape from this. To claim that the Buddhistic story and philosophy were borrowed from the legends and myths about Jesus is as false and ridiculous as it would be to assert that Benjamin Franklin obtained his theory and proofs of electricity from Samuel B. Morse, or that Gutenberg stole his notions of printing from type from your humble servant.

The story of the immaculate conception of Christna, of his virgin mother and godly father, of his miraculous preservation, of the slaughter of little innocents—at the command of a wicked tyrant—for the purpose of destroying him, of his being very sweet upon the damsels of his country, about his having a band of disciples who followed him and listened to his parables and teachings, of the numerous miracles he performed, of the powers of evil and enmity finally obtaining the power over him and putting him to death on a tree by the side of the river Ganges, followed by the most astounding phenomena of nature; all this is as beautifully told as that of Buddha, and probably is just as true, but I will not ask you to listen to it in detail. It is written; it was written thousands of years ago. That it is older than the story of Buddha is proved by the ancient statues of him in the old rock temples of India; and the fact that Christna was held to be the eighth avatar of Vishnu, and Buddha the ninth, conclusively proves that Christna is the older. To pretend that the conception of either was dependent upon the Semitic race, and that the imaginative, ideal, poetical, inventive people of India, Persia, and Burmah were under the necessity of coming over to the Mediterranean Sea to a small branch of the Arab family which inhabited the mountainous tract, nearly forty miles wide, called Judea, to borrow or steal the idea of a god begetting a son upon a virgin, of this son's wonderful career and final violent death upon a tree, when not a single person in Judea, poet, writer, or philosopher, can be found who knew anything about such events ever taking place, is altogether too absurd to claim the attention of a sensible person for one minute. It would be equally as sensible and equally as truthful for us in this country to set up the claim that Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon Bonaparte obtained their military knowledge and ability from Robert E. Lee and Ulysses S. Grant.

You object to my orthography of Christna, but I have authority for it, and there is no law against spelling his name with a C. If you wish to spell Christ with a K, I will not object. When I was over in Italy last summer I noticed they spelt Jesus with a G, and perhaps Jehovah, too, but it did not disturb me. I thought they paid their money and should be permitted to take their choice.

A Letter and Reply.

EAST TROY, WIS., Dec. 5, 1880.

COUSIN DAN: Your letter has been lost from my folio, and I don't know as I can answer it in detail. I am sorry you are losing all confidence in everybody and everything. I know that this is an uncertain world and we are surrounded by uncertain people and uncertain institutions. But death and taxes are sure; perhaps some other things.

You speak of the great puzzle of the universe unsolved. Well, that is none of my business. The God who made the universe has shown his ability to run it for several thousand years with less clashing and confusion than we see in the affairs that man takes part in, and I hav enough to do that belongs to my duty to God and mankind. With regard to Beecher and others, I am no man-worshiper, and do not believe that orthodox cussedness is better than any other sort.

As for Ingersoll and his clan, I remember they were filling the mails with obscene books and papers, and, when stopped, their convention poured forth a stream of filthy blasphemy so mean that the vilest papers in the country were ashamed to report their language. And the Infidels themselvs knew that the law against obscene literature would prevent it being sent through the mails. Many of our academies and seminaries hav stopped publishing catalogues with names of scholars, because these vile knaves use them to direct their moral poison to the scholars.

God's law provides for hypocrits and unbelievers in the same place. I do not like their company, so shall not follow their teaching or their example. There are some who shout "hosannah" one day and "crucify" the next; some Peters who follow the master afar off; some Judases who try to sell their savior very cheap; some Ananias or Sapphira boasts of having consecrated himself or herself and all they hav to Christ, when they would not giv a dollar to save the redeemer's cause from dying out, or those who try to preach the gospel from starving.

Some of the tares may be removed, but others must remain until the harvest, lest the wheat be pulled up in trying to remove them. But the God of the harvest will remove the wheat from the chaff, and he promises no good to the chaff.

My mother and your sister followed Christ, and he cheered, strengthened, and sustained them in many a dark and trying hour, and they went home happy in a savior's love. John, the beloved disciple, leaned upon the savior's breast at the last supper, followed him to the judgment hall and the cross, received his last message to his mother, and had less to regret than those who followed afar off, and was doubtless much nearer ready for the day of Pentecost.

Those first days of the church are a picture of the church of to-day—a poor representativ of a savior's love, yet the best which God, the almighty father, has been able to get out of poor, frail, erring humanity.

Judas went out and hanged himself. Ingersoll and the enemies of Christ hav less sense of honor than Judas, or they would either repent, like Peter, or go and hang themselvs, as their leader did.

Now, my dear cousin, I am as much disgusted with hypocrisy as you are. I hav very little faith in mankind, but I hav unlimited faith in Christ. I believe the true remedy for all life's wrongs is in following very near to Christ. We need more of his spirit, more of that patient meekness which receives the kiss of Judas so soon after the agonies of Gethsemane, and with Calvary so near. When we hav that spirit we will move steadily on, never stumbling over the faults of others or puzzling ourselvs with the doubts of unbelievers. When they are able to tell us all the mysteries included in that phrase, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," if I am not too busy in doing what my hands find to do for God and humanity, I will listen to them if they do not speak disrespectfully of my savior. Please write soon.

Yours truly, E. H.

THE REPLY.

BEAVER CITY, NEB., Dec. 15, 1880.

COUSIN ENOS: Your favor of the 5th is just received, and though I take it for granted that it was kindly meant, I am compelled to say that if it manifests the spirit of Christianity, I am glad I am not a Christian.

You say you will listen to unbelievers if they do not speak disrespectfully of your savior. That is the spirit of doing to others as you would that they should do unto you! Slander us and falsify our position, and then obligate us to be very tender of your feelings. Christians cannot now apply the thumbscrew and the rack as they used to, so they benevolently wish us to be accommodating enough to go and hang ourselvs, as the mythical Judas did. Seeing you seem to know how Judas did it, please tell me which way he killed himself first. You think when our "clan" hav solved all the mysteries of the universe you will be willing to listen to us if you hav time. We shall know as much then as you think God does, and yet you may not be able to find time to listen.

Well, we won't bother you with the solution just now.

You think no one has a right to doubt anything in the Bible unless he knows all that is in the universe. I think I hav a right to doubt anything that has never been proved. The Bible has never been proved to me either as to its authenticity, its inspiration, its truthfulness as a historical record, or in any other way, though I hav sought diligently for such proof, and studied it for years with a determination to believe. I hav examined both sides of this question. You hav examined one side a very little, and hav not "time" to examin the other. You and I are opposits. You hav very little faith in mankind and unlimited faith in Christ; I hav unlimited faith in mankind and none at all in Christ.

I hav asked favors of my fellow-men, and sometimes they hav been granted; but I hav prayed to Christ for years, and for all I got for others or myself I might as well hav prayed to the Virgin Mary, or kissed the big toe of the vicar of Christ at Rome. I am a pagan, pure and simple, not a Christian in any sense.

You think the true remedy for all life's wrongs is in following very near to Christ. That may do very well in this age for those who want to be on the popular side, who fear to be misrepresented and lied about, and who fear the ostracism which the "meek and lowly" are sure to visit upon all who refuse to wear "the theological old clothes supposed to hav been cut out by certain apostolic tailors eighteen hundred years ago."

Yes; we need more of the spirit of Christ, more of that spirit which established the Inquisition, which incited the Crusades, which burnt Servetus and Bruno and imprisoned Galileo; more of that spirit which burnt witches and cropped Quakers' ears; more of that spirit which "came powerfully" upon Samson and inspired him to slay a thousand men with the famous jawbone; more of the spirit that said, "He that loveth not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be accursed;" more of the spirit of him who came not to "send peace on earth but a sword," and who will pronounce the final benediction, the consummation of the divine plan of salvation, "Depart, ye accursed of my father, into a lake of fire prepared for the devil and his angels." We need more of that spirit which induces sixty-five thousand preachers in this country to fortify themselvs behind their pulpits and revile and lie about such men as Ingersoll, Parton, Chainey, Bennett, Jamieson, and their co-workers, telling the mean, malicious lie that they favor circulating obscene literature.

You say we are surrounded by uncertain people and uncertain institutions. Yes, and one of the most uncertain institutions is Christianity. It is so uncertain that its advocates dare not examin its foundations themselvs.

You say you hav little faith in mankind, yet you would blame me for not believing the most improbable stories because it was an ancient rumor that they were told by Matthew, Mark, Luke, etc. I am certain men can and do lie. They do lie now, and they tell more and meaner lies in the interest of Christianity than in almost any other interest. I would believe Robert G. Ingersoll as readily as any man on this planet, but if he should tell me that he had seen a dead body restored to life after it was partly decomposed, that he had heard devils talking out of men, that a man struck a rock in a desert with a stick and a river of water ran out large enough to supply three million people and their cattle; that he had seen a flock of quails large enough to made a solid wall around the earth twenty-five feet thick, and forty feet high; that he had seen five thousand men, besides women and children, stuff themselvs on "five crackers and two sardines," I should think he was crazy or had been afflicted with softening of the brain and been converted.

I hav not "lost faith in everybody and everything." I hav faith in people who hav been born once, but lose confidence somewhat when they hav been "born again."

You say the puzzle of the universe is none of your business, but it is mine. The crude guesses of ancient ignoramuses do not satisfy me. The hard, cruel, and infinitly merciless creed of Christianity, an eternal hell for the major part of mankind, I abhor with every drop of my pagan blood.

> "I am sick at heart of craft and cant,
> Sick of the crazed, enthusiast's rant:
> Profession's smooth hypocrisies,
> And creeds of iron and lives of ease."

If that creed is true many of my best friends are in hell. God might as well damn me as them. I stood beside Henry R. Putnam. A preacher told us how heroic it was to fight and if need be die for our country. Putnam was an outspoken Infidel. He was struck by a shell in front of Petersburg, and merely had time to call his wife's name and say, "Tell her I died for my country," and he was gone. If the creed is true, he went to hell for his patriotism, while Bro. Munsee stayed at home, slept on a soft bed, comforted the widows, and finally knelt on a cushioned seat and thanked God that "we had won the victory." No wonder Ingersoll says, "Any man who can believe in an eternal hell and not go insane has got the heart of a snake and the conscience of a hyena."

The man you rely on for information about obscene literature is Anthony Comstock, a man who hired (as was proved in open court) three girls to strip stark naked and dance before him, and stood and watched them for an hour and twenty minutes.

President Hayes said "Cupid's Yokes" was not obscene. Attorney-General Devens, in a public letter, said it was not obscene. I hav read it, and though I think some of it is not in good taste, it is nice and clean compared with much of the Bible. I can point you to lots of passages in the Bible which neither you nor any decent man would dare to read to a public audience. You had better pick the beams out of your own eyes. When Christians quit circulating their "inspired" nastiness there will be at least a decent cloak thrown over the hypocrisy by which they seek to crush those they cannot meet in an open, honorable way. I say, make a fair comparison; and if any Infidel writes, publishes, or circulates anything more obscene than some of the "word of God," hang him. Ingersoll says those who are trying to blacken his character are not fit to black his boots. He says that any man who says he favors the circulation of obscene literature is a liar, and that is much truer, as well as plainer, than "holy writ."

I loved sister Lizzie and aunt Lucy, but I know that Lizzie was always troubled with the hard features of her creed, struggling on the one hand with her tender heart to soften it, and on the other hand trying to believe it true. Severe in her censure on those who avowed disbelief, and on the other hand trying to suppress her own doubts with the prayer, "Lord, increase my faith," sister was a kind, loving woman, and the only harsh thing about her was connected with the Methodist creed. I never saw anything about aunt Lucy that made me think she was a Christian. I don't recollect ever seeing her read the Bible, and I am certain she never called my attention to it while I lived there. I read the Bible less while at your home in Vermont than at any other time of my life, but you instructed me in the philosophy of Horace Greeley, which was better. I used to work there till my poor boyish arms ached clear to my shoulders, and when it was nearly dark I could go and get the cows. Once when you and I were knocking cow-dung to pieces on the meadow, the steamer Saltus came along. The lake was as clear as glass. I could see the inverted steamer and the mountains down in the depths nearly as plainly as those on the surface. The boat seemed flying between the sky above and the sky below. I was standing in a dreamy trance, imagining the walking-beam to be some huge giant, when you called out to me, "Hallo there! hurry up with your snail's pace, or we'll not get through for dinner." The enchantment was broken, and I came down to the poetic occupation of scattering cow-manure. If I could only hav kept my mind upon the employment of knocking dry cow-dung with a wooden mallet I should not hav found any puzzle in the universe and might hav died orthodox.

But supposing my mother and grandmother believed the Bible, can I believe it on that account, if I do not think it is true? Doubtless I had some ancestor not very remote who thought the earth was flat. Does that perceptibly affect the shape of the earth?

You think it a lamentable fact that there are those who would not giv a dollar to spread the glad tidings of eternal damnation or to support the disinterested preachers of that inspiring doctrin. Think of those preachers having the cheek to take money from unbelievers! Won't they be happy up there to know that the good-natured unbelievers who helped to support them while they lied about Paine, Voltaire, and Ingersoll are in hell!

But you do not like the company of unbelievers, and so I suppose you will eschew mine. I love and respect you as a man, but if your creed makes you so bigoted that you want to cut my company because I don't happen to believe that God Almighty came down to Palestine, was born a little Jew baby, lived about thirty years, and was killed, I shall hav to abide by it. If you can be happy in heaven when, looking down into hell and seeing me stretched out on the burning marl and eager devils turning me carefully over with their forks in order to get a good, even roast, I guess you will not miss me much if you throw me off now.

This is an age in which the truth must be told, and I am one of those who are "set aside" for the purpose of telling it. Infidelity to-day means fidelity. If the whole world forsakes me, and I go to hell for it, I will tell what I think is true and denounce what I think false. Ever your cousin,

DANIEL PRIESTLEY.

Why the Spirits are Such Fools.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been reading considerable in your paper about Spiritualism, and a few remarks thereon will be in order. First, I think that if ever those spirits possessed any sense during their earth life they hav lost it all since they arrived in the spirit land, wherever that is, and this is how I account for the loss: You see, on their passage or trip thither they must hav been filtered through a very fine sieve, and nothing but the chaff flew unto the shining shore. And now that chaff displays itself in a Punch and Judy circus, rapping and tipping tables, making chairs dance, scribbling on slates, and a few other tricks of necromancy, all of which is the clearest case that spirits out of bodies are the most consummate, cranky buffoons, inasmuch as wise spirits would not be guilty of such useless and unmeaning nonsense. Whensoever spirits can show a few grains of common sense and perform some very useful exploits so that everybody can behold the advantages of Spiritualism, then and not till then can any well-balanced mind accept its claims.

Moreover, bipeds are not the only animals possessed of organic minds. Quadrupeds and all animated nature hav mental powers in a greater or less degree. Why then should they not also hav a second existence or a perpetual spirit life, and also show off a few monkey shines on the circus principle?

Dear brother, the world has been too long cursed with priestly trickery and pious shams, and these so-called mediums are only priests or priestessse under another name. People are going insane too rapidly through the excitement of knavish charlatans, hell-fire revivalists, and all manner of excesses in the wild superstitions of the period. It is time a halt should be called before our grand old planet becomes a universal madhouse. If such craziness is called science, the less we hav of it the better.

I firmly assert that there is no power or wisdom now existing or that ever did exist capable of proving man has any more than one life, which begins and ends on this planet, and that a disembodied spirit is impossible. It is anti-natural, and must be false.

Friend Bennett, if the money inducement was taken out of these dogmatic and crack-brained swindles you would soon see them vanish and be no longer a curse and barrier to the true and steady progress of mankind. Yours for solid truth and daily delight right here in an honest and useful body,

Cincinnati, O. T. Winter.

The Backwoods Preacher "Givs Away" his Brethren.

Dearly Belubbed and Belubbedesses: Dis ebenin' I must rely on my faultless memry for de tex' as some church scamp done stole my only Bible. Before nex Sunday I will buy annuder one. I'se 'shamed to 'knowledge dat I will purchase dis obscene book, but I'm obliged to as I needs it in my business of unearthin' and tryin' to overthrow dis god ob superstition an' de works ob de crack-brained heathens who bow down to a worse myth dan ole Jupiter himself. But it ain't gwine to be so bad arter all, 'cause I will purchase dis book ob filth when de night am pitch dark an' no one but de bookseller am a lookin'. Dis beats some ob my Christian friends, for dey would make similar purchases when no one but dereselvs was round. But I forgiv dem, for dey know not what dey do, an' if dey hav money dere church will forgiv dem more freely dan I, 'cause dey will forgiv dem in advance ob udder wickedness dey hav in dere mind's eye, but am not yet prepared to carry out.

Now hold your breff while I sling at you one of de main stays of de ark of Zion, commencin' 'bout as dis:

"Him dat believeth in me shall hav life everlastin, an' him dat believeth not shall be damned."

Can you stand it? It do come heavy, but let us bear up under it. De tex am plain an' 'splicit to a roughness. Your pastor am equally as confidingly 'splicit when he say dat he'll be damned himself if he believes a word of it. Christ say he damn us if we don't believe he am de boss savior, an' every man an' woman of sense say to demselves, Damn sich 'stravagant nonsense! Did you ever see an ole mule run principally to cheek? Don't dis put you in mind of it? De idea of so many miraculously born an' quickly put to death saviors being on his here earth, an' Jesuz de only one of the whole crowd dat damns de world if dey don't swear by him an' call him boss. Egotism! I should jess particularly remark dat your pastor shouldn't be s'prised if right here ain't where egotism was born.

Why, dis egotism lays over all udder efforts of de different saviors as de tip-top of a lighthouse towers 'bove de stranded clam whose bones lie bleachin' on de beach, or as the North Star twinklin' millions of miles 'bove de busy pismire's lowly home, or as de fact am, nature has nuffin in her vast storehouse from which to take to show de vast difference between de egotism of dis tex an' de common article in use 'mong de brainless ones of to-day. Believe in him? Sho! See here; I'se gwine to get up a lottery. I will put in two hundred tickets. Every one of you can buy any ticket you choose. If a hundred of you wants to invest in No. 44 I will sell dat 'ticklar number dat many times or any udder number. But remember dere am only one prize. If you don't draw de right ticket, den away you go a flukin' to a hell of eternal torments, where, arter you hav been a hundred billion years you will find dat you are more dan a thousand billion years too soon for de first bell for brekfus. To speak less paregorically, dar am upwards of two hundred different 'ligions. Is you foolhardy enough to put your grappling irons on any 'ticklar 'ligion an' lay your hopes of eternity on grabbin' de prize? If any one 'ligion of de two hundred is the correct thing den de balance must be all wrong. Den what is you gwine for to do? Do right. Liv de life of a man, an' if you am a woman be one. You can't be a man an' a hypocrit, nor a woman an' a scandal retailer. You can flop on your knees an' pray an' pray till you done get de rheumatiz in a chronic state in your knee-pans, and symptoms of lockjaw show derselvs in your mouf, and belong to a red-hot orthodox church, and hold a pew in the amen corner, and be deacon and treasurer of the Young Men's Christian Association, and trustee of an orphan's home, and hole lots of good payin' sits in Zion kase you are long-winded in prayers and givin' in of 'speriences never 'sperienced.

But I tole you what dey all don't amount to the pin-fedder of a hummin'-bird in a tornado carrying thousands of trees and hundreds of tons of rubbish in its breff. Dat 'ligion am a mighty poor thing. Look at de time lost in prayin', preachin', singin', and stomach-achin' about what poor miserable sinners you be! Aint the time lost in dis made up by the wolves in Zion's fold preying on one anudder? After the udder kind of prayin' and exhortin' and more prayin' den don't dar come in business hours, de stealin', perjury in and out of court, bearin' false witness, seducing sisturs in Zion, and pulling and defamin' the characters, and a shovin' into poverty's gutter all they can, jess so long as they can rise up on the ruins they hav made?

Then comes in the prayin' and exhortin' and more prayin'. And who am the wussest of the hungry pack? I dunno. My acquaintance with these oleomargarine hypocrits in black with white chokers, but who should be adorned with the zebra costumes of Sing Sing and tote around a ball and chain—I say my acquaintance with these, to use the language of Rev. Mr. Kalloch, of San Francisco, these spawn of hell, am extremely limited. But I won't call names but tell you how to spot 'em. When curiosity impels you to enter one of the howlin' shops of Zion, you will find there several different grades of people, First, there will be a few dere out of curiosity, on the back seats, like yourself. Then there will be fashion's slaves, come to show dere fine clothes. And away up to the gospel-box you will see the ripraving, snortin', rampant, howlin', and the slow-speakin', oily,cuss who rolls up his eye, like a dyin' hen, and who walks along jess as quietly as a moccasin snake can crawl. Dese last fellows am the ones to keep your eyes peeled for. Look out for them. Don't let them into your confidences—or houses. If they call at your homes on business connected with the Lord, make an appointment at the cow-shed, and come 'scorted by a cowhide and six-shooter. Of course it am needless to warn you consarnin' coming in contact with the boss shepherd, the pastor. The Truth Seeker has shown up their murders, infanticides, seductions, wife-beatings, poisonin's, and all the deviltries known to man. So there's no use of hanging out any lantern when this great reflector shows you where these smooth-faced syrens sit on Zion's beach to lure the poor ignorant sailors on life's sea to sartin' destruction.

Similar to the Christian pastors, I done lose sight of my tex 'casionally, so I will jess ax you to sling your minds back to the beginning of the sarmon. If you hav the tex in your mind, I jess wants to ax you if you believe all the preachers believe in the truthfulness of the same. Not by any means. When you see a poor fanatic of a preacher, one of the poor white trash order, poor in pocket and raiment, and still wretcheder in brains and education, then I say boldly that this ignoramus, who was raised on the nursing-bottle of ignorance, rocked in the gum-tree cradle of superstition, and wearing later the butternut overalls and hickory shirt of conceit—that this poor benighted heathen do believe in dis, and not only that but goes in advance of his educated brethren, and believs, word for word, everytin' in the Jewish legends and history, which is now published in one volume, with "Holy Bible" pasted on its back.

But when you axes me if the educated portion, the ringlet-parted-in-the-middle pastors, believe in it, I say nay, nay, louder than a horse can. The poor religious fanatic am sincere in his belief. The educated portion am not. The fanatic goes through life poor. The fashionable pastor waltzes on the trail of his lowly master to the clanging of silver dishes. His battle of life am a play, whar de heaviest artillery am the poppin' of champagne corks in the face of a battery of smiles of the fair ones of his flock.

He sincere? Why, bress your black faces and white hearts, if it was fashionable he would jess as lieb preach from the Koran, take texts from Robinson Crusoe, swear that the Arabian Nights—or, wuss than all, that Joe Cook's sermons and lectures—were inspired.

No, belubbed, there's no sincerity in the educated preacher. His education alone convicts him as a liar. His conduct in life shows him to be an actor, taking part in a monstrous poor play, having no plot, action, or anything in it but the most absurdest absurdity. A play gotten up by some old Jewish wag and handed down and used by the church as a collar to put around the necks of their lambs.

Preachers sincere? They believe in the tex of this evening or any portion of the Old or New Testament? Don't you ever get so far down on the trail of insanity as to believe it. Take all the trades and professions in these United States and you will find that those belongin' to the ministry hav done more to disgrace the fair name of man than any six others. Of course they don't go to prison, 'case there's powerful influence brought to bear, especially by the daughters of Zion, to save the criminal, who takes in one hand the blood-stained and tear-bedrabbled banner of Christianity, while the other hand is up to all manner of wickedness.

To sum up: No man or woman out of the insane asylums, and who knows enough to read or write, can believe the egotistical vaporings of Christ as mentioned in the previous foregoin' portion of this excrutiatingly interesting sarmon.

There will be no collection taken up this evening. I dun furgit to say that the quarterly salary due yer pastur will not be accepted by him for the simple reason that he made a winning by backing his white hoss Old Truth agin Uncle Snow's big black Joe Cook, and Old Truth brought in two hundred dollars into your pastor's pocket. For all these mercies I humbly thank the waywardness and general slowness of Joe Cook—the black hoss.

Furthermore, if any of the brudders or sisters will hav roast duck or possum for this evening's meal, they will so signify it by remaining until the rest clars out, and 'scort their pastor to that lovely home whar peace and plenty reign. Commence climing to your feet and warbling the sweet hymn commencin':

Oh, happy day that fixed my choice
On thee, proud Reason, for my guide;
Well may the priests giv up their bizz,
And tell no more the lies they v made,
Yes, well may they giv up the day,
And make their grub some other way.
Happy day, happy day,
When the old Bible's laid away.

Gunnison's Prayer.

O thou infinit and merciful being called God, hear thou my humble prayer. Be thou lenient to me for not praying as would be fashionable, and grant at least a few of my requests.

To those suffering the pangs of hunger, and from the present "cold snap," extend your mercy in the shape of food and fuel. Keep the famished poor in work seven days in the week at $1 a day in order to enable their good and holy employers to pay from $100 to $1,000 for a pew in one of your untaxed churches! Yes, O Lord, keep thy righteous hand on the throats of the toiling and ignorant masses, and withhold true knowledge from them. Let no man escape thy dire vengeance who is obliged to work on the Sabbath; but, O Lord, protect and shield those who are devout on Sunday—thou knowest it covers all their legal rascalities for the rest of the week. Help thou those who profess thee to cut the throats of those who differ with them, and stop the mouth of unbelievers. Let their tongues be bored with red-hot irons, a la Puritan, cast them into prison, blacken their names, and damn their souls in a Presbyterian hell! Let thy grace abound on bigots who despise and persecute their brothers for not believing thee to be such a monster as these whitened sepulchers would hav us believe. Bless thou, O Lord, thy hot-houses, where young innocent humanity is wheedled and scared into a belief repulsiv to them. Let thy Holy Ghost abound in the Sunday-school, because if thou should disseminate knowledge in its place, a generation would depopulate thy churches. Let faith and ignorance hav full sway on earth or a dire calamity would befall thy army of one hundred thousand able-bodied men. O Lord, think of it; they would hav to work! O thou Great Unknowable, reach out thy hand to those "on the fence" and stop their ears to that call of reason from the other side. O Lord, scare them back and shelter them from the foes of superstition! With thy all-seeing eye look upon man's "inhumanity to man;" see the misery that man causes his weaker brother! Cast a look upon those languishing in "Christian institutions" and cheer their living death with a pitying glance. Dry their damp and noisome cells and shed a tear over the injustice prevalent in a free land! Alleviate the pangs and excruciating tortures which man must endure and which you are accused of being the author of. Let love, truth, and justice prevail! Relieve all suffering! Heal the sick and cheer the dying.

"But, Lord, remember me and mine
With mercies temporal and divine,
That I for gear and grace may shine
Excelled by nane;
And all the glory shall be thine.
Amen, Amen." —Burns.

Letters from Friends.

BELMONT, N. Y., Feb. 18, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: You can put me down for five dollars for your trip around the world.

JOHN LEILOUS, JR.

CITY POINT, FLA., Feb. 11, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I must say your letters from Europe gave me a better idea of the cities and places visited by you than any other book of travel I ever read. I hope soon to be able to help make a circumnavigator of you. Fraternally yours,

C. L. FABER.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Jan. 26, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: I hav been waiting to see if your trip around the world was likely to be imaginary or real. The proposition begins to look like business, therefore I will be willing to stand for $5 should the trip be undertaken. I would also be willing to giv you a letter of introduction to my brother, not very far from Bombay, if you like. He is principal of a high school, wherein he teaches many Brahmin pupils. He is about as godly as I am.

A little more fresh air after the Christian incarceration would do you no harm. I cordially wish you may soon get on the way and hav a pleasant trip, beneficial to yourself and others. Yours truly,

F. J. EMARY.

FORD RIVER, MICH., Feb. 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed three dollars for my paper for 1881, and put me down for $5 for that trip around the world. If you are short at the time of starting call it $10, as I can find some one to take the books for the other $5. Be sure and call at Joppa, as that will be the nearest route to Jerusalem; and, while there, call up to the grounds of the American colony, some five minutes' walk from the city, and see if any of them are there yet awaiting the coming of their Lord and master, Jesus Christ. Myself, among many others, would be very much pleased to learn if there hav been any signs of his coming, as I helped to make up the number of dupes that went there in the year 1865 with the intention of staying there until we should see the Son of Man coming in all his glory and the final winding up of the devil's kingdom and the establishment of peace on earth and good will to man. But having got nearly starved out at the end of one year, I returned back to America, not by the help of the editor of the New York Sun, as stated in Mark Twain's "Innocents Abroad," but by the little remainder that was left of the $2,500 on my departure from the states. I want it understood by every lover of truth that I and several others, having a little money left, were forced to pay $5 apiece for a deck passage—furnishing our own beds and provisions—from Joppa to Alexandria on board the excursion steamer Quaker City. Mrs. Beach gave out of her own pocket $1,700 to help those home that had no money. But many of us paid our fares there and back, and by hard work hav made a living ever since and hav something laid by for a rainy day.

Had I read Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" I never would hav gone to that particular part of this earth which God gave to Abraham, including the holy city, with all of its dirt and filth. I also visited the birthplace of the so-called savior of the world, and would be glad to hav that country pictured to the lovers of truth as it really is, and not by the pen of a religious fanatic, who can see the glory of God in everything, even to a stinking camel or a dirty Arab. I do not know of any one better than yourself who could do it justice, having read with the greatest interest all of your writings from your first trip. Your friend and well-wisher,

JOHN A. DRISKO.

SALEM STATION, WIS., Feb. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by the tab on my paper that I am indebted to you for my paper since January 1st. I can't rest and owe you for THE TRUTH SEEKER, that boldest and best of Liberal papers. Inclosed you will find $3 to square up to '82.

At twenty years of age I became a skeptic, and my way has grown brighter as time has rolled on, and now at sixty I take no stock in the Christians' God or heaven, or the devil and his abiding-place, hell. To learn how to liv well and happy in this world engages all my effort and attention. If I ever find another world I will try and do as well there. No mad God in mine that needs prayers and incantations to conciliate.

Here's a hand to all THE TRUTH SEEKER friends; and should you conclude to take a turn about this cold planet, put me down for $5 to help you along.

Fraternally yours, A. D. CORNWELL.

BRIGHTON, Jan. 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see that my time is nearly expired for which I hav paid for the ever-welcome TRUTH SEEKER.

You will find inclosed seven dollars, three for THE TRUTH SEEKER and three dollars and fifty cents for the North American Review, which I wish to read for a year, to see how interesting it is, and the remainder for that most unfortunate Infidel, J. Hacker, now in his old age left to the tender mercies of the people of the world.

I hav been very much pleased with the reading of your very interesting letters from Europe.

I see by reading the friendly letters there is a prospect of your going on a pilgrimage to the orient. If you should undertake the journey around the world, I should prefer your graphic descriptions to that of your peers, Seward and Gen. Grant. Would it not be as well to hav some one go with you? If you do go put me down as one who will pay five dollars for the two volumes of travels.

The extra paper I hav let a neighbor take to read; he says he will take it for six months.

How pleasant it would be for you if instead of the transmigration of souls, as believed by the ancient Egyptians, there could be a transmission of the acquirements attained by Elihu Burritt, who was master of fifty languages, and spent his time and talents in peace congresses in various countries, although his efforts were soon followed by wars most destructiv!

I will close by wishing you long life, health, and prosperity. Your truly. E. E. CURTIS.

BRAGGS' CROSSING, WYO., Jan. 20, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: When the time comes for you to go on your trip around the world count me in for $5.00, which you will find inclosed in this letter. We wish you success and a pleasant journey.

Your friend, GEORGE BOGGS.

RTONVILLE, MINN., Jan. 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: "Chalk" me down for a "V" toward your trip around the earth. Will remit when called for through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours, etc., M. E. FELTON.

BENTON HARBOR, MICH., Feb. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed money-order for five dollars for the around the world trip, and if it so happens that you should not get stamps enough to insure the journey, which I hope will not be the case, you will please send me the two volumes you wrote while incarcerated in the bastile at Albany.

Now, readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, don't hang back in a good cause, but send the stamps right along to Bro. Bennett, so that he can get ready for an early start on this most important journey. Let every subscriber hand in $5.00, and I think you would be loth to take three times $5.00 for what you will receive in return.

Now, sir, please accept my best wishes and kind regards for you and yours, both now and forever.

Very truly yours, N. CASTLE.

VINTON, Jan. 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: When you get ready to start on your pilgrimage or sight-seeing around the world I'll send you a "V," for I want to go with you (in mind at least). Your happy faculty of description takes one along without a great deal of cost or trouble. If you should visit the Holy Land be sure and hav your lamp along and well-trimmed, so as to light it by the holy fire. You might make it pay. C. C. C. & Co. might pay big for a light. And you might set up a miracle shop with it. Who knows?

Your friend, M. BRANIN.

QUINCY, O., Jan. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hereby authorize you to place my name upon your list as a subscriber for the two volumes of an Infidel Around the World. I trust that none of us will be long held in suspense with regard to this wonderful and profitable undertaking. Should it be necessary to increase my subscription, rather than hav this prove a failure I will readily double the amount called for. I shall do all in my power to increase the subscription among the few Liberals and semi-Liberals in this vicinity. The extra numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER you sent to my friends are doing marvelous work among the thinking class, and I feel that they, like "bread cast upon the waters," will in days to come make a grand showing in favor of Freethought and unshackle the chains of fear and superstition. But like all work of this character where investigation and solid thought is the necessary stock in trade, it requires much time to reach the people, especially the ignorant portion of the community.

The volume "An Infidel Abroad" came safely to hand, and is highly prized by all to whom I hav shown it, and I hope soon to be able to giv you an order for quite a number of them. I herewith inclose pay for it and other matter.

Wishing you success in this greatest of undertakings, that of freeing the human mind from slavery, I remain your friend and well-wisher,

C. H. CUSTENBORDEN.

HURON, DAKOTA, Jan. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Count me as one who will take ten dollars' worth of stock in your round the world trip. I think shares should be ten dollars instead of five. Yours respectfully, A. H. RISDON.

CONCORD, KY., Feb. 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Finding it incumbent upon us to remit again, we send you $3.00—$2.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER; the other Mr. Vance sends gratuitously, as he says, to help Elmina keep the irons moving.

You certainly hav made great improvement in the appearance of your paper. Though we had not before found fault with it, we now admire it greatly. By adopting Mr. Green's suggestion it would be no less than perfection. When Mrs. Slenker placed THE TRUTH SEEKER before all other papers she was doubtless right, though we cannot quite agree with her in regard to your letters from abroad, though they are splendid.

A friend once asked me which of all the books I had ever read I preferred. I unhesitatingly replied, "The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers," and I hav not as yet seen any reason to change.

I do not think T. B. Wakeman's lessons in "Constructiv Liberalism" difficult to comprehend. All that is required is a little exertion of mind, the duty of all readers.

Mr. Vance says should you make the much-talked-of trip around the world he will assist you to the extent of his ability, believing generosity like yours should always be reciprocated.

With many good wishes for yourself and Mrs. Bennett, I am truly yours, VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

GEORGETOWN, COL., Feb. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You can count me in for five dollars on your proposed trip around the world.

I hav read every one of your letters from Europe. They were exceedingly interesting and instructiv; I felt quite sorry when they were ended.

Inclosed please find four dollars for continuation of THE TRUTH SEEKER till next January, also please send the book "An Infidel Abroad."

Yours truly, MRS. T. S. OLD.

SHAKERS, N. Y., Feb. 14, 1881.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: Sorry to spare you to go so far; but if you conclude to go, count on me for five dollars, for I must hav the books.

Yours, etc., G. A. LOMAS.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav seen statements in some newspapers concerning the number of their readers, and find that they calculate each paper has three readings by separate persons. I don't know but it may interest you to be told how one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER is read, and how many look for it from week to week. In the first place, two of us pay the subscription. The paper is left at my house during the day by the postman, and my wife and daughter look it over pretty well before I come home. I spend the evening pleasantly and in excellent company with THE TRUTH SEEKER. The next day I take it with me to the printing-office where I am employed, and leave it with the proof-reader, who has enough spare time generally during the day to master its contents. Then at night it is delivered to a particular friend, who keeps it over Sunday. On Monday evening I can finish my reading, and then turn the paper over to my next-door neighbor, who manages to get from one to three other readers among his associates before he disposes of it finally. This neighbor has been the direct cause of two subscribers, to my knowledge; how much further his influence has extended I cannot tell. So, you see, my one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER has eight readers, and with me it has become so much a necessity and I look for it so eagerly that I would let all the other newspapers go if I could afford but one.

Wishing for your long-continued health and prosperity, and with kindest regards to Mrs. Bennett, I remain, Very truly, your friend,

R. H. CRESSINGHAM.

P. S.—Put me down for $5.00 for your trip around the world. I enjoyed your letters from Europe very greatly, R. H. C.

[It is all very well for THE TRUTH SEEKER to be thoroughly read, and it would be well could every number issued hav so manifold a reading. Still this style is a little hard upon the printer. If a single copy of the paper has eight readings for one paying, it remunerates the publisher rather poorly. If every one of the eight would pay the price of the paper it would help the publisher in his up-hill business and enable him to issue it at a less price. Some copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav twenty readings while but one of the number thinks it incumbent on him to pay for what they enjoy. Probably no paper in the country has more readings for the number paid for. We submit it that this is hardly a just way of doing. The paper is an expensiv one to publish and requires a good deal of money to meet its expenses. If every person who reads it would pay for it "like a man" it could be issued at a much less price—at two dollars a year—and that would make it better not only for the publisher but the patrons who pay for it. Let every person who reads it feel that a moral obligation rests upon him to help pay for it.—ED. T. S.]

FOREST GROVE, OR., Feb. 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am in favor of that proposition of sending you around the world, and for that purpose (missionary) I will donate $5, and when you arrive upon holy ground I hope you will not be awe-stricken at the holy sight and get converted and giv us a repetition of the travels of holy men in the Holy Land. But instead I want to hav an account of that country from the pen of one whose mind is not beclouded with superstition. I attended a reverend's lecture on the Holy Land some time ago, and among the many pious incidents of his travel, here is a sample: Among the company en route to the Holy Land was an Infidel who did not believe in the Bible or any religious creed, and they had not been in the Holy Land twenty-four hours before that Infidel was worshiping God. Now, if the old dirt is such a converting medium I should think that the church would bring over a ship-load for the benefit of us Infidels. Now, Bro. Bennett, forewarned is forewarned. If you do succeed in obtaining enough funds for the trip, let me know and I will remit. And I will take $15 more in books of your travels after they come from the press. Hoping that you will succeed, I remain, Yours in opposition to superstition,

W. C. CLOW.

CAIRO, MICH, Feb. 20, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: You can put me down for $5 for your contemplated trip around the world. I am behind on my subscription, but it it is on account of protracted illness of myself. I hav not been able to be out of the house more than one-fifth of the time since last fall, and I am not well yet, but I feel it the duty of every lover of truth and progression to do all in his power to promote the interest of the same. I shall soon receive some money, and then you shall be remembered. Very respectfully,

C. W. STOWE, M. D.

CARROLLTON, ILL., Feb. 17, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I hav at last succeeded in getting another subscriber, so I now inclose money order for $5—$3 for the paper for the new subscriber, $1.50 for your book, "An Infidel Abroad," and 50 cents for Mr. Hacker, if you will be kind enough to send it to him. I hav not the address by me at this moment.

You may put me down for $5 for your around the world trip. Whenever you let me know that you want it it will be forthcoming. You are very much needed at home, but still I hope you will go and enjoy the trip and come back strong and healthy and be able to seek for truth for several years yet. I am some twelve years your senior, and hav done a great deal of hard work. I could always hold the plow much better than I could the pen,

Yours for the cause, WM. BLACK.

LESLIE, MICH., Feb. 15, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I hav come to the conclusion that it must be the clergy that will liberalize this country, so let us deal gently with them. Encourage them to free their people from the yoke of ignorance and superstition.

I want to tell you a little of my own experience in that direction. We hav four churches in good running order in our town. I had always attended all churches, so that I stood high in society, but always talked and read to them when I had a chance. But when I heard a good and pure woman preached to the depths of hell I could not stand that, so I had this notice put in our local paper: "I challenge the four clergymen in Leslie to debate on the Bible. I claim that this book is the work of man only, and the people who support such false doctrins are mere dupes. The clergy pretend that death is an awful thing, and from this they derive their money—just as a rumseller decorates his rooms to make his wealth. What is the difference?"

That struck the people dumb. Not long after I chanced to meet some of the clergy on the street. They said they wanted to talk with me. I invited them to my house. I talked very plain to them, told them I pitied the poor enslaved minds of their people, and they were the ones that should suffer, and they agreed with me. I then read to them a letter from your paper, entitled, "The Terrors of that Dreadful Hell." I hav read that to a great many. Church-members hav almost worn that paper out reading that piece. The preachers asked me very kindly to come to church and they would preach a good Liberal sermon. I hav always tried to do all the good I could, and thinking I hav done some good shall continue to do so.

Now I want to say a few words to the readers of our grand and noble TRUTH SEEKER. Let us all be careful what is said about sexual relations. We all hav our family secrets, and that is all right; but if we publish it to the world it is all gone. I always hand the paper to my friends and neighbors, but there hav been a few I dare not pass around, as I know what the church would say about them. They say we hav no respect for ourselvs, which I know we hav. I think I can help you when you get ready to take that little trip around the world, and I am sure you will return in safety to us. I am sure if there if there is any effect in prayers or in good wishes, as we would call it, you will return to us safe and sound. Yours in truth, SARAH A. HAYNES.

NEVADA, OHIO, Feb. 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose you $3, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. Nothing is more pleasant to me than to be able to render you assistance by way of increasing your subscription list. A man that has suffered as you hav simply for daring to publish an Infidel paper ought by all means to be sustained. You certainly deserve a circulation for your paper amounting to a hundred thousand copies weekly; and no doubt it will not be many years before the Freethinkers of America will do their entire duty, and swell your list to that extent. [Gladly will that day be welcomed.—ED. T. S.] You can put my name on the list of contributors to your round the world trip. The five dollars will be forthcoming as soon as the announcement is made that the money is wanted. What a pity you cannot duplicate yourself and leave the veritable D. M. Bennett in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, performing his duty there while the real D. M. Bennett is on his way around our planet! But wonders of such a character hav long since ceased to transpire and find credence only at present as a matter of heaven's arithmetic in the muddled brain of the ardent trinitarian. [A good representativ will fill our place in our absence.—ED. T. S.]

On last Thursday evening John W. Clark, the eminent scientist of Chicago, gave us a lecture on the constructiv and destructiv forces found to obtain in nature, and on Saturday evening following "Condensed Sunbeams" was the pleasing theme on which he talked to us. Both subjects were handled in a most masterly and scholarly manner. The audiences were not verv large, but those present were highly delighted with the very many interesting and original statements made. Some one had put a slip of paper on the stand, on which was written, "What do you gain by studying nature?" This the professor answered most admirably, and if the author was present the answer will always be remembered; and if good sense prevails in the mind of the party a high estimate will in the future be placed on nature, and the silly notions of a supernatural will be permitted to go for what they are worth, and that will be surprisingly little.

Please send me inside of ten days twenty-five copies of the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion, ten Paine's "Great Works," five copies of the work you wrote in prison, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times;" thirty "Age of Reason" in paper and thirty in cloth. Bill as usual.

Your friend and brother, DR. E. MOYER.

BUCHANAN, CAL., Feb. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I write you this to inform you that if you are going to make the trip around the world I will send five dollars to help you out. If you go to Palestine, just hunt up Lot's wife and let us know about her. Yours truly, D. BUCKINGHAM.

EXCELSIOR, MINN., Feb. 14, 1881.

DEAR FATHER BENNETT: If you knew anything about Minnesota snow-storms and snowdrifts, and the distance that some of us hav to go to the post-office, I would not hav to ask your pardon for my tardiness in acknowledging your kindness. How different you must be from orthodox publishers! I knew you had a heart as big as a pumpkin, and of such material as never throbbed in an orthodox bosom; but do you know I did not expect the papers on the terms proposed? They came, however. I took the first instalment into the school-room where I attend, and the orthodox young people got hold of them before I had read them, so I did not get the first reading by a good ways, and I had about forty applications to borrow.

My poor little letter in THE TRUTH SKEKER got me a long list of correspondents from north, south, east, and west.

Mr. Spurgeon said some time ago that Joe Cook had scattered the skeptical hordes of America. I think he did not know what a "stupendous truth" he was telling. If I thought he would ever see THE TRUTH SEEKER I would like you to tell him that Joe Cook and many others like him hav scattered them so thickly that they can be seen with the naked eye in every hamlet in this broad land. I hav so much to say, but my space is run out.

Your little girl, BIRDIE SHUCK.

PORT JERVIS, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose you a post-office order for $7, together with a list of subscribers which I procured last Sunday after my lecture.

Nearly one hundred people were turned away from the hall last Sunday night, unable to get in. If I should remain much longer a larger hall would hav to be procured. Six new members joined the League. So the cause goes marching on. MRS. H. S. LAKE.

ASHLAND, OR., Jan. 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your note containing receipt for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881 came to hand, also "An Infidel Abroad" came in good shape. Please send me four copies more, for which I inclose money order for $7.50. I am much obliged for the copy you sent. Should like to hav some of them containing your likeness if there is no difference in price.

I want to scatter the "Infidel Abroad" about this priest-ridden town as much as possible.

Fraternally yours, O. COOLIDGE.

BOULDER, COL., Feb. 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: How much I admire the different writers in THE TRUTH SEEKER! Each number contains something new, something useful to humanity, to the thoughtful. There is always something to lead one up higher in the scale of progression. If I were only a scholar how I would like to pen my own thougbts to help fill its pages, as it appears to me to be doing more to remove the film from the sight and mind of deluded man and woman than any other journal at the present time! Perhaps other journals hav been equally as good in their place. THE TRUTH SEEKER has advanced and opened a wider field for thought and improvement. How much I admire the writings of good, pleasant, progressiv, thoughtful Elmina Drake Slenker. I hav been satisfied in my own mind for a long time that if men and women were as particular in the propagation of their own species as they are to improve the breed of their horses, cattle, and sheep, there would be a great improvement in the human family. Yours for the right,

EPHRIAM POUND.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see that you don't allow Gov. Cornell's heartless indifference for poor Phelps to go unrebuked. I was in the Court of Oyer and Terminer at Albany when Phelps was tried, and well remember the man and the pitiable plight his weakness rather than his criminality placed him in.

Keep up good courage, Mr. Bennett, and smite error, as you do, wherever you find it. The religion of Humanity is about to be ushered in to supersede that failure of failures, that knock-kneed creed of Calvary, that "pioneer" of civilization, which turns the suffering fr m its door with a "Be ye clothed, be ye fed if the Lord wills!" and if you differ with them, "Be ye damned" also.

Of all the articles in THE TRUTH SREKER, I like those of T. B. Wakeman best, leading me, as they do, and opening up to me afresh the channel through which my mind has unconsciously traveled. I would suggest that Mr. Wakeman's inestimably valuable contributions to Liberalism be printed in pamphlet form. I want them. [They will be so printed.—ED. T. S.]

Again, I say, take courage, Mr. Editor; the family of truth seekers is on the gain and religion is on the wane. At any rate, I shall be ever proud to subscribe myself A YOUNGER BROTHER.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Feb. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: The Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, February 9th, says, "Just now a multitude of people are praying for a revival, and prayers for the conversion of the world are made throughout the entire year in all our churches, yet how meager the results compared with the amount of praying!"

The results should be meager. If our God desired anything to be it would be without any regard to the praying done by the Cincinnati clergy, no matter how many millions of dollars they succeed in getting paid annually, or quarter annually, for their praying.

Moreover, as God Almighty tells us in the book that he has given us that he does not intend to allow very many to be saved, it becomes evident that the laity shell out their "spondulicks" in vain when they employ their reverends, divinities, and doctors of divinity to pray for results that are evidently undesirable if not obnoxious to the divine mind.

Moreover, the Cincinnati people hav no right to negotiate with their clergy for a mass of prayers to be said for the conversion of the world, and they lay themselvs liable to censure as they pocket the aforesaid "swag," knowing that every cent of this money is paid them as a fee by those who hav been induced to believe that they (the clergy) are able to control the infinit powers to work either for good or evil as they may choose to hav it, and that their influence will be used for the benefit of those who are the most liberal in their payments.

A celebrated personage, who it is supposed knew at least as much as an avarage Cincinnati professional soul saver, says (John xvii 9), in an address to his father, "Thou hast," etc. He did not pray for the conversion of the world, but for only those who were ordained from the foundation of the world to be saved.

The cheek of the Cincinnati clergy is sublime in claiming more influence over the throne above than the savior possessed. But these men are employed by the year to pray, and their contract implies how much they are to pray and what they are to pray for, and their salaries are proportioned to their supposed bulldozing ability or persuasiv influence. As they do not refuse to pocket the pay for so doing, it seems as though they should appear to endeavor, at least to some extent, to make a show of exercising some of their boundless influence that they claim to be endowed with. ROYAL.

AYER, MASS., Jan. 31, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am much pleased with Volume I. of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." I am almost wicked enough to wish your enemies would imprison you again to giv you an opportunity to write another work and augment the cause of Freethought. If the "blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church," the persecution of Infidels is the seed of truth and freedom. The Christian church seed has been kept watered with blood.

Let Infidels to bloody, persecuting, hell-inventing Christianity water their plants with the tears of human sympathy, and giv every plant an even chance to the pure air of heaven. Flowers do not quarrel about colors and odors. Why should men about opinions?

Let us hav peace,
More light and less noise.
Let the oppressed go free.

Yours for the right always, ELIJAH MYRICK.

"JOHN'S WAY" is very good indeed. I received it at ten o'clock at night and sat up till four in the morning to read it all through. K. P. KIDDER.

Ghost of Lord Shaftesbury.

BY ALHAZA.

He did not affright me. I'm backward returning
To clear away cosmical mists if I can.
No chain correlated you'll find very stable;
The world is one thing, and another is man.

Just take him to Jupiter, where they lie dreaming,
The rocks and the moss, in their dim-lighted day,
A thoroughbred Yankee would soon learn to flourish;
He could liv on fried mushrooms at least for a day.

Acidians there, and the great Amphioxus
Would grow and develop by ocean and stream;
And corals, and shells, too, would murmur around them,
They hav plenty of work and no leisure to dream.

To eat a small fish or be fanned by a seaweed
Is leaving small impress and wearing no scar.
Duns Scotus penned folios of law on God's forehead,
The autumn winds rustled, and now they are—where?"

"Do you know," said my lord, "what John Boehme thought of virtue?
He said it was higher and stronger than God;
And does it inhere in the heart if a demon
Or angel is known by the path he has trod?"

To search for the "principle" gently that guides us,
To know what a rose is, a sound, or a beam,
How much we belong to ourselvs or surroundings,
Is only to uselessly wrestle and dream.

Much stronger a "principle" is than a "person;"
His glory may fade on some sunshiny day,
But love will liv on when the heavens are hoary
And the last beaming star sped in darkness away.

The Knowledge of God.

BY THOMAS KINGSTON.

The Christian gods are dying
As did the gods of old;
Both priests and popes are crying
For brain-made gods in gold.
The time is fast approaching
When wisdom digs the grave
For feudal gods encroaching
On each priest-ridden slave.

The gods of inquisitions
Killed the wise and great,
And gods in church positions
Diffuse the seeds of hate.
Those gods are still baptizing
Where Christian princes reign,
With savage laws advising
Their clans to lawless gain.

The gods of ancient races,
Who fed on human blood,
At sacrificing places
Sucked the nectar flood.
And with the clans progressing
To present laws supreme,
They send the devil's blessing,
That superstitious stream.

The wars which slew the millions,
Caused by the Virgin's Son,
With Holy Ghosts in billions
Presiding o'er the fun,
And great Jehovah's legions
Marched in human gore
From India's burning regions
To wild Hibernia shore.

When mental education
Explains the creeds that are rife
Then each god-wounded nation
Can read the laws of life,
And the Messiah songsters
Will then annex his praise
With man-devouring monsters,
Which glide in ocean bays.

Thoughts on Nature.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

In drops of water nature's depths
The microscope unseals,
For myriads of living mites
A single drop reveals.
Her greatness or minuteness how
Can any mortal grasp?
An insect might as well attempt
The mighty sun to clasp.
The smallest living thing that moves
And lives but for an hour,
What thought can it receive of man,
His goodness or his power?
Yet smaller than the smallest mite
That is to man made known,
Is man himself to nature vast,
By truthful science shown.
His life is but a moment joined
To all eternity.
A drop, a flash, is man at best,
In nature's mighty sea;
How can he reach the infinit?
Or pass the furthest stars?
How can he grasp the great unknown?
Or burst his prison bars?
What can he know of the beyond,
That lieth back of all?
How can he giv a feeble guess,
With intellect so small?
How can he know but all that's seen
By powerful telescope
Is but what circulates within
A little ether drop
That floats in nature's ocean vast,
Which has no bounded shore,
On which no bark, with lightning speed,
Through ages could pass o'er?
If man is but a speck of nought,
With hair's width knowledge broad,
What can he know of future things?
First causes, or of God?
If then the infinit's so great,
And man so very small,
Can he, though fearfully he strained,
Move infinity at all?
Oh, is it possible that man
Can move the powers supernal?
Can he, whose life's a moment's flash,
Enrage the eternal?
He may, when he can lift himself
By boot-straps to the moon,
Or bail the mighty ocean dry,
With nothing but a spoon.
O man, dost think the sun was formed
For thy especial cheer?
Or that because thou art so vile
The stars will disappear?
We doubt, and smile, and think we hear
An animalcule say,
Because pa peeped behind the scenes,
The world will pass away;
But I'll become an elephant,
For I don't do such things,
To endless joy and truth I'll fly,
On two tremendous wings.
O man, is not thy name conceit,
To dream that nature bends
Her vast resources, wealth, or power,
To meet thy selfish ends?
To dream infinity could mourn,
Because thou art perverse,
Or smile when thou art virtuous?
Her laws for thee reverse?
Man can but speculate or dream,
From whence comes nature's power,
But guess if the unknown is sweet,
Is bitter, flat, or sour.

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents: twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Proposition.

I am prepared and will send to any one address, direct from my office, one sheet of "Blackfoot's" Magnetized Paper, postage paid, every week for one month for forty cents; two months for seventy cents; three months for one dollar. Address, with amount inclosed, James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom st., Philadelphia, Pa.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness--Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

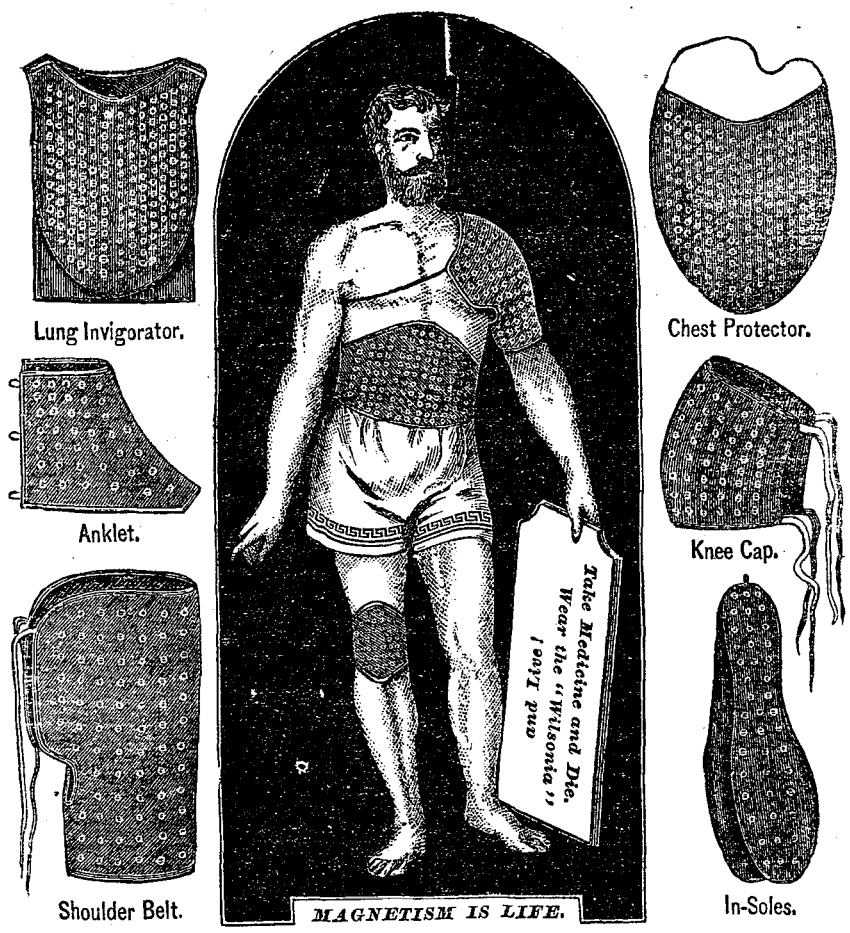
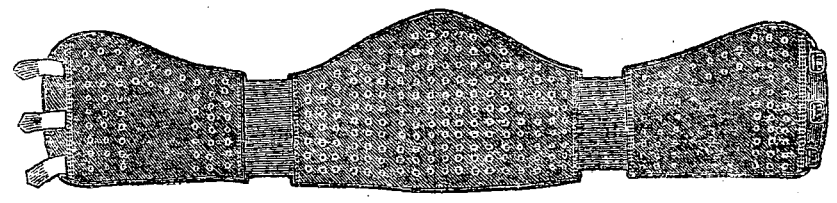
WILLIAM WILSON,



MEDICAL ELECTRICIAN,



Inventor of the "WILSONIA," and Lecturer on Electrical Therapeutics, Author of "The Trial of Medicine," "The Language of Disease," Medical Fallacies," &c., &c.,

465 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN,

May be Consulted Daily from 10 A.M. to 8 P.M. Free of Charge!

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere pads or plasters which lose their efficacy in a few weeks, but are so scientifically constructed that they WILL LAST FOR TWENTY YEARS, and can be worn by different members of the same family from time to time.

Sciatica and Lumbago Belt.

DESCRIPTION OF ABOVE GARMENTS.

Each Eylet is a galvanic cell attached to a series of powerful magnets. They are light as ordinary garments, and produce a soothing yet exhilirating effect upon the system, without causing shocks or sores, as in electric belts or galvanic chains.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are the Despair of Physicians, and the Annihilation of Quack Nostrums and Legalized Quackery. Thousands of persons are being constantly hurried on to Apoplexy and Paralysis by the use of Cephalic Snuffs and Washes. Catarrh can be readily cured without any of these nostrums.

THE "WILSONIA" CORSET AND MAGNETIC BELT

For Ladies and Gentlemen will cure Asthma, Catarrh, Loss of Energy, Nervous Debility, Bleeding at the Lungs, Kidney Disease, Tumors, Rheumatism, Gout, Paralysis, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, and every form of Female Weakness.

SEND FOR PRICE LIST Containing THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere plasters which become useless after a few weeks' wear, but they retain their curativ powers for twenty years, and can be worn by any member of the same family from time to time.

Persons who read this notice may wonder that I had not advertised my discovery before. The fact is, I determined when I arrived in America not to publicly advertise until I had five hundred patients in one city, to whom I could refer as evidence. I hav now over one thousand persons in the city of Brooklyn ready to testify that my galvano-magnetic belts will remove and cure every malady known to man, except a rotten lung, and even where the lungs hav begun to decay, my appliances will arrest the decay and heal them.

Here in the city of Brooklyn the paralyzed hav been restored; patients suffering from inflammatory rheumatism hav been taken off their crutches; nervous maladies, bearing on mania, hav been completely cured; martyrs to varicose veins, whose legs hav been bound in elastic stockings for twenty years, hav cut away their bandages, and are now as free from varicose veins as the healthiest person living; children who had never walked from birth up to three, eight, and twelve years of age, are now walking about as other children. In short, the cures effected by my appliances seem so miraculous that the above statements sound like an Arabian Night's tale. Nevertheless, these facts can all be substantiated, and my open letter to the physicians and the Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn must convince the most incredulous that my invention is the most wonderful on record.

My offer of five thousand dollars to the physicians and Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn is still open, and will continue so to be for six months.

I am prepared to go into the hospitals and will only take their incurable cases, suffering from paralysis, locomotor-ataxia, inflammatory and chronic rheumatism, congestion of the kidneys, pleuro-pneumonia, or any disease their medicins hav failed to reach—less an absolutely decayed lung.

If the citizens of Brooklyn continue to suffer from any of the above maladies, they hav themselvs to blame.

The cost of my appliances, though seemingly expensiv, is one hundred times cheaper than the present method of purchasing physicians' prescriptions and paying for their drugs.

Send to me for price lists and testimonials, and make full inquiries of those who hav been cured, before you waste your time in calling upon me.

I court the fullest scrutiny, and prefer not selling you goods until you hav inquired of those who hav been cured.

To you who are suffering, and are now under the care of your physicians, prevail on them to call upon me, and acquaint themselvs with my invention before making any statements in regard to the same.

Note the address, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

Male and female assistants always in attendance from 10 o'clock, A.M., till 8 o'clock, P.M.

My appliances are being used with as marked success in England as in Brooklyn and New York

Gems of Thought.

No soul is desolate as long as there is a human being for whom it can feel trust and reverence.—George Eliot.

REPENTANCE is not a virtue, or does not spring from reason; but he who repents of his act is twice miserable or twice impotent.—Spinoza.

Now the distempered mind
Has lost that concord of harmonious powers
Which forms the soul of happiness, and all
Is off the poise within. The passions all
Hav burst their bounds, and reason, half extinct.
Or impotent, or else approving, sees
The foul disorder. —Thomson's Seasons.

IT may be affirmed that one of the best features in every human belief is its elasticity; that one sign of its vitality is its amenability to change. Were it irrevocably fixed, it would hav some secret affinity with death and the grave. Paradoxical as it may seem, if religion be among the things that cannot be shaken, it must change. Its form must die that its spirit may liv.—Prof. Knight in Scotch Sermons.

STERN daughter of the voice of God!
O Duty! . . . I myself commend
Unto thy guidance from this hour.
Oh, let my weakness hav an end!
Giv unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice:
The confidence of reason giv,
And, in the light of truth, thy bondman let me liv!
—Wordsworth.

IT ought not to be the leading object of any one to become an eminent metaphysician, mathematician or poet, but to render himself happy as an individual and an agreeable, a respectable, and a useful member of society. A man who loses his sight improves the sensibility of his touch, but who would consent, for such a recompense, to part with the pleasures which he receives from the eye?—Dugald Stewart.

ALL truth is new at some time or other, and the fullest encouragement should therefore be given to free and fearless expression, since by such expression only is the promulgation of new truths possible. An age of advancement is always an age of heresy, for advancement comes from questioning, and questioning springs from doubt, and hence progress and heresy walk ever hand in hand, while an age of faith is also an age of stagnation.—Mrs. A. Besant.

WHEN remedies are past the griefs are ended
By seeing the worst, which late on hopes depended.
To mourn a mischief that is past and gone
Is the next way to draw new mischief on.
What cannot be preserved when fortune takes Patience, her injury a mockery makes.
The robbed that smiles steals something from the thief;
He robs himself that spends a bootless grief.
—Shakspere.

MAN'S happiness is on earth, and can be known and understood. The promotion of that happiness is an intelligible aim. The test of morality may be applied by every one. It is a system which everybody can understand, and which the common sense of each must approve, for by it man livs for man, man labors for man, the effects of each are directed to the good of all, and only in the happiness of the whole can the happiness of each part be perfected and complete.—Mrs. A. Besant.

CANDID persons of all creeds may be willing to admit that if a person has an ideal object, his attachment and sense of duty toward which are able to control and disciplin all his other sentiments and propensities and prescribe to him a rule of life, that person has a religion; and though every one naturally prefers his own religion to any other, all must admit that if the object of this attachment and this feeling of duty is the aggregate of our fellow-creatures, this religion of the Infidel cannot, in honesty and conscience, be called intrinsically a bad one.—J. S. Mill.

IF every good man that now pines with want
Had but a moderate and beseeming share
Of that which lewdly-pampered luxury
Now heaps upon some few with vast excess,
Nature's full blessings would be well dispensed
In unsuperfluous, even proportion,
And she no whit encumbered with her store.
And then the giver would be better thanked,
His praise due paid, for swinish gluttony
Ne'er looks to heaven amidst his gorgeous feast,
But will—besotted, base ingratitude—
Crams and blasphemes his future. —Milton.

WE should keep a perfect indifference for all opinions, nor wish any of them true, or try to make them appear so; but, being indifferent, receive and embrace them according as evidence, and that alone givs the attestation of truth. They that do thus; i. e., keep their minds indifferent to opinions, to be determined only by evidence, will always find that the understanding has perception enough to distinguish between evidence and no evidence, betwixt plain and doubtful; and if they neither giv nor refuse their assent but by that measure they will be safe in the opinions they hav.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

WE think that much of what is called piety is worthless. Many hav fallen into the error that there can be no excess in feelings which hav God for their object, and, distrusting as coldness that self-possession without which all virtue and devotion lose all their dignity, they hav abandoned themselvs to extravagances, which hav brought contempt on piety. Most certainly, if the love of God be that which often bears its name, the less we hav of it the better. If religion be the shipwreck of understanding, we cannot keep too far from it. On this subject we always speak plainly. We cannot sacrifice our reason to the reputation of zeal. We owe it to truth and religion to maintain that fanaticism, partial insanity, sudden impressions, and ungovernable transports are anything rather than piety.—Dr. Channing.

"Now, villain, come with me before the judgment seat of heaven!" cries the hero of a play by M. Duque, of Paris, as he hurls the heavy villain into the car of a balloon, cuts the rope, and begins a duel with him with bowie-knives as they shoot upward to the skies.

"BY A LARGE MAJORITY."

Three months ago, when two hundred of the leading citizens of Gunnison City met in convention on a street corner, there were seven or eight Michigan men among the crowd. When Colonel Parker presented the following resolution it was a Michigan man who supported it:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to wait upon Calabash Sam, late of Deadwood, and inform him that after sunrise to-morrow morning this crowd will open fire on him with the intention of furnishing a corpse for our new graveyard.

The committee of five went out to find Samuel and deliver their message. He sat on a bench at the door of his shanty, a shot-gun across his knees and a pipe in his mouth, and he preserved silence while the chairman of the committee read the resolution; then he asked:

"That means me, does it?"

"She does."

"They don't like my style of carving and shooting, eh?"

"That's what they kick on."

"Well, I won't go. You havn't got 'nuff men in the whole valley to drive Calabash Sam a rod. Return to the convention and report that I'm here for the season."

"I forgot to mention," continued the chairman as he leaned on his gun, "I forgot to mention that the convention has adjourned. This committee finds itself in an embarrassing situation, and it sees only one way out of it. Onless you'll agree to pack up and travel, this committee will feel called upon to—to——"

"To begin shooting, you mean?"

"Exactly, Samuel, exactly. You may hav already observed that two of the committee hav got the drop on you?"

"I see."

"Corpses which are riddled with buckshot hav a very unpleasant look," continued the chairman, as he rested his chin on the muzzle of his gun.

"Yes, that's so."

"And it's kinder lonesome, this being the first plant in a new burying-ground."

"Y-e-s, it may be."

"And so, take it all around, the committee kinder indulges in the hope that you'll see fit to carry your valuable society back to the Black Hills. You may hav observed that three shot-guns, each under full cock, are now looking straight at ye. We don't want to bluff, but it's gitting nigh supper time."

"Well, after looking the matter over, I'm convinced that these diggings won't pan out low grade ore, and I guess I'll take a walk."

"Right off?"

"Yes."

"Right up this trail?"

"Yes."

"Very well. While the committee feels sorry to see you go, and wishes you all sorts of luck, it hasn't time to shake hands. Step off, now, and for fear you ain't used to walking, we'll keep these guns pinted up the hill until you turn the half-mile bowlder. Trala-la—march!—Detroit Free Press.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 11. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, March 12, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE average cost of converting sinners at Waterbury, Conn., according to the calculation of a pastor, is $800 apiece.

A BILL is before the Connecticut legislature providing for ascertaining whether "life is extinct in a deceased person."

IT may, perhaps, furnish some idea of the extent of the Maine lumber business to know that 150,000,000 feet of logs will be driven this year.

THERE need be no more bets made, for the state senate has, by a vote of 18 to 5, decided that the proper pronunciation of the name is Arkansaw.

THE Rev. H. B. Cook became more popular in ten minutes, at Slatersville, N. Y., by jumping into a swollen icy stream and rescuing a drowning boy than by his two years of preaching in the town.

EIGHTY-SEVEN of Mr. Hayes's recent nominations were allowed to fail in the Senate. His career rapidly dwindled at the close into insignificance, being largely shorn of its chief feature, the distribution of official patronage.

CHRISTIAN LOVE. — The cable brings the news from across the Atlantic that the Catholics and Protestants of Marsala, Sicily, hav aroused the hatred which for over three centuries has dwelt in their hearts. The Catholics attacked and pillaged a church of the Protestants, the minister of which barely escaped death.

BRITISH ladies strewed with flowers the path of General Sir F. Roberts as he left London for the Transvaal, there to crush a little community of brave and upright farmers for daring to be free. In this century there has been no more deliberate national crime committed by people priding themselvs on being leaders of civilization.

A METHODIST revival at Bellefontaine, Ohio, is conducted in a vigorous manner. The minister in one meeting got down on all fours and capered up and down the aisle to illustrate a dog simile; and on another occasion several of the sisters seized a young sinner of their sex and forcibly carried her to the chancel. She cried for help, and was rescued by her mother.

THIS has been a hard winter indeed for settlers in the Northwest. The starvation and freezing of cattle in Montana hav caused, it is said, a loss of about twenty per cent. Hay has not been obtainable on the main lines of avel at any cost, and the deep snow has made transportation and browsing alike impossible. Hay at $45 a ton in a country where fodder does not usually enter into the expense account of stock raising makes it sometimes cheaper to kill cattle than to save them. Dakota has also a fuel famin.

A LAWSUIT is in progress between the new-fashioned and the old-fashioned Quakers in Indiana, the contest being over the possession of certain church property, but arising from differences of religious belief. One branch of the Quakers no longer wear a peculiar habit; they do not wait for the spirit to move them in meetings; they hav salaried preachers, and hav abandoned many of the other long-established Quaker usages. The conservativ branch claim that such worshipers are not Quakers at all, and should not be allowed to use Quaker meeting-houses.

IN one of the bazars, says a letter from India, we saw some fakirs and devotees. One of these remarkable fellows had vowed to lie upon a bed of upright nails for twenty-six years, and of these he had accomplished sixteen when we saw him. His body was attenuated and full of sores resembling leprous spots. We asked him for one of the nails which pierced his miserable body. He took one from the foot of the bed, refusing in every instance to part with any of those which gave him the most exquisit pain. Another miserable devotee was holding a flower pot at arm's length. Judge of my surprise when he told me he had held it there for five years. Another stood with arm uplifted, and had no power to lower it or move a muscle, the member being dried, stiff, and dead, while the long finger-nails, like bird's claws, penetrated the flesh on his wrist. All of these fellows looked moldy and sad.

JUDGE CHARLES EDWARD FORBES died recently at Northampton, Mass., and left $300,000 to establish a free public library, but he left also the condition that no minister of the gospel is to hav anything to do with it, and that no sectarian books on religion are to be admitted to its shelves. If the town of Northampton does not within three years accept the bequest the sum will go to Harvard College. Stephen Girard, half a century ago, tried this sort of a condition in connection with the bequest with which he founded Girard College in Philadelphia. His requirement was that no clergyman should ever enter the building or grounds.

GERMAN physiologists hav been experimenting to ascertain the best means of restoring frozen animal life, and they announce that the hitherto accepted theory that persons who hav been exposed too long to extreme cold should not be brought into contact with warmth except by slow degree is wholly erroneous. Dogs were frozen by artificial application of cold until breathing and pulsation had almost wholly ceased, and then attempts were made to restore twenty of them in a cold room, twenty in a warm room, and twenty in a bath of warm water. Of the first, fourteen died; of the second, eight; of the last, none. The warm bath brought about restoration in a remarkably short time.

THE Methodist ministers of the Springfield district of Massachusetts, in their annual meeting, had a lively two hours' discussion on faith and healing. Several of the clergymen held that prayer was effectual in healing the sick, but the majority of the speakers believed that such cures were wholly the result of imagination and will. The Rev. Frederic Woods said that it would be as sensible for him to ask God for $50,000 as for a sick man to pray for restoration to health. His theory was that God did not interfere in temporal matters at all, but only in things concerning the soul. A layman replied that he had been comforted in the past by the preaching of Mr. Woods, but what he had said on this occasion about the uselessness of prayer greatly shook his faith.

VIENNA physicians hav been examining with much interest a three-year-old pair of twins, who are not less of a natural curiosity than the Siamese twins were. From the breast bone down they hav but one body; above that they hav two wholly separate and complete organisms. They hav only two legs and feet, but four arms. The sense of feeling in the two upper parts is entirely distinct and individual. At the moment of medical inspection, one of the heads looked peevish and occasionally cried on account of a painful tooth, while the other looked fresh and lively, and shouted "Mamma!" The inner arms come in conflict, and cause fights between the twins. Though the pair hav one body below the breast, they do not get hungry at the same time. The left foot seems only to be connected with the left head, and the right foot with the right head. One of the feet was pinched, and only the head on that side cried out.

AN interesting trial of a new stenographic machine was made in the French Chamber of Deputies the other morning in the presence of M. Gambetta and a number of other officials and members. The mechanism, which is an Italian invention, is worked by a kind of key-board similar to that of a piano, and the stenographic signs are automatically printed on a continuous ribbon of paper. The signs registered of course represent sounds, irrespectiv of spelling, and the machine can be used by a person unacquainted with the language spoken. The daughter of the inventor worked the machine successfully, taking down a speech read at average speed in Italian, and one read in French by M. Gambetta, she being ignorant of the latter language. A comparison between the speed of the machine and that of the short-hand writers of the Chamber proved favorable to the former. Further experiments will be made with a view to a possible adoption of the apparatus, which is already in use in the Italian Chambers.

A VERY clear idea of the value of so-called revival meetings may be obtained from a knowledge of the character of one lately in full blast in Ohio. The prophecy falsely imputed to Mother Shipton that the world will come to an end his year was firmly believed by Emma Vandersmubker, and it made her insane. She went to religious meetings, and eloquently exhorted the people to prepare for the great event. She moved her hearers greatly, and in one night twenty of them became converts to Christianity. Pastor Hadden says that, knowing the girl's lunacy, he was in doubt what to do, but concluded to let her go on, and a tremendous revival is the consequence. It requires only the ravings of a maniac to teach people the great mystery centuries of wisdom hav not succeeded in solving. We might imagin those converts infected with the lunacy of their converter if circumstances did not empower us to believe that infection was entirely unnecessary to reduce them to her level. But what sort of a preacher is it who abandons his pulpit to the rhapsodies of a mad woman?

PRESIDENT HAYES has shown singular discrimiuation by pardoning the criminal postmaster who robbed the government of a large sum of money while in charge of the Deadwood post-office and was sentenced to imprisonment for five years and a fine of $5,000 therefor, although he refused to pardon the Mussel Slough settlers, who are guilty of no crime, and whose only offense at worst was the possession and improvement of land which they honestly believed to be the property of the government, subject to entry and location the same as other public lands. Nor is it yet decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that these lands are not the property of the government. These settlers found the land a desert; they caused it to teem with luxuriant harvests; and a great many people honestly believe they hav been wronged, if not robbed, of these lands.—San Francisco Chronicle. In more than one instance Mr. Hayes has shown himself far more merciful to absolute criminals than to unfortunates who had committed no crime whatever.

A DISCOVERY of much archæological interest has recently been made in the Algerian Sahara. M. Tarry, who has been carrying on work in connection with the proposed Trans-Sahara railway, having noticed a mound of sand in the neighborhood of Wargia, had the sand dug up, and discovered the top of a spherical dome. This naturally aroused his interest, and getting his Arabs to dig still deeper, he found underneath the dome a square tower, then a platform of masonry, and finally a complete mosque. Continuing the excavations, M. Tarry soon unearthed seven houses in perfect preservation, and came upon a subterranean watercourse. At the last news, nine houses had been disinterred, and M. Tarry was getting additional assistance to clear out the precious watercourse, which he describes as sufficient to irrigate a small forest of palms. It is well known that the Sahara was at one time much more populous than it is now, and its trade much more extensiv; but no one seems to hav supposed that cities had been buried under its sands so recently as since the introduction of Mohammedanism.

News of the Week.

JAY GOULD has gone West.

HAYES vetoed the Funding bill.

THE Coercion bill has passed the House of Commons.

A CO-OPERATIV dry-goods store is to be opened in this city.

THE Democrats are in a minority in the House in the new Congress.

THE whole sum called for by the various appropriation bills before the last Congress was $191,280,168.94.

A PROVISIONAL government has been organized in Peru. The terms of peace which Chili will make with her are not yet known.

PANCHOT, who won the O'Leary belt in the six-day go-as-you-please race last week, made 135 miles in 24 hours, the fastest walk on record.

THE British troops hav met another reverse in South Africa. Gen. Roberts has left England to assume command of the army of occupation.

THE bark A. E. Bottsford was wrecked off Barbuda on the 10th ult., and while trying to rescue the crew thirteen nativs of that island were drowned.

HANLAN, the champion oarsman, is back from England. His friends in Toronto gave him a reception, presenting him with various medals and a check for $500.

GEN. GRANT and the World's Fair Committee hav given up the idea of getting Central Park for their site. The preliminary million dollars is very nearly subscribed.

THE state asylum for the insane at Danville, Pa., was burned on the 5th. The 350 inmates escaped the flames, but many strayed into the woods. The building cost the state $500,000.

THE tide in the rivers and bay around New York rose to such a hight that piers, streets, and basements on the low ground were flooded. The tide was the highest that has occurred for ten years.

THE train on which Mr. Hayes and party were going home from Washington collided with a heavy engin at Severn Station, Md., and was partially wrecked. Three men were killed. Mrs. Hayes and the ladies with her were thrown to the floor of the car, but no other damage was done to the party.

AN Italian schooner went ashore at Coney Island, Friday, and out of a crew of fourteen men only one was saved by the Life-Saving Corps. Four of the crew while clinging to the wreck made an agreement to simultaneously cut each other's throats, which they did with razors, preferring to die by their own hands rather than drown. They did not succeed in killing themselvs, but ran around the deck bleeding copiously until the vessel went to pieces and they were swept into the sea.

GARFIELD was inaugurated on the 4th with more pomp and show than ever attended any previous inauguration. About 15,000 troops took part in the procession. A special session of the Senate was held on Saturday, and Garfield sent in and the Senate confirmed the following Cabinet: James G. Blaine, of Maine, Secretary of State; William Windom, of Minnesota, Secretary of the Treasury; Robert T. Lincoln, of Illinois, son of Abraham Lincoln, Secretary of War; W. H. Hunt, of Louisiana, Secretary of the Navy; S. J. Kirkwood, of Iowa, Secretary of the Interior; Thomas L. James, of New York, Postmaster-General; Wayne McVeagh, of Pennsylvania, Attorney-General. The selection is generally well received by the country, but, with the exception of the Secretary of State, is not regarded as a very strong body of officials.

Constructiv Liberalism.

LESSON IV.

THESIS.

The explanation that modern Biology givs of the origin, growth, and distribution of vegetable and animal life on our Planet entirely displaces the assumption of "creation." It explains the origin and physical history of Mankind, and is the sure constructiv basis of our practical and emotional life relativ to the organic world around us.

TEXTS.

1. "Know thyself!" This is the source of all wisdom, said the great thinkers of the past, and the sentence was written in golden letters on the temple of the gods. To know himself, Linnæus declared to be the essential, indisputable distinction of man above all other creatures. I know, indeed, in study, nothing more worthy of free and thoughtful Man than the study of himself. For if we look for the purpose of our existence, we cannot possibly find it outside of ourselvs. We are here for our own sake.—Karl Ernst Baer, 1824 (Haeckel, Evolution of Man, vol. i, p. 244).

2. Is man a peculiar organism? Does he originate in a wholly different way from a dog, bird, frog, or fish? and does he thereby justify those who assert that he has no place in nature and no real relationship with the lower world of animal life? Or does he develop from a similar embryo, and undergo the same slow and gradual progressiv modifications? The answer is not for an instant doubtful, and has not been doubtful for the last thirty years. The mode of man's origin and the earlier stages of his development are undoubtedly identical with those of the animal, standing directly below him in the scale; without the slightest doubt he stands in this respect nearer the ape than the ape does to the dog.—Thomas Huxley, 1862 (Haeckel, Evolution of Man, vol. i, pp. 363, 364).

3. Felix, qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas;
Atque metus omnes, et inexorable Fatum
Subjecit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari!
Fortunatus et ille, Deos qui novit agrestes,
Panaque, Sylvanumque senem, Nymphasque sorores!

. . . . . .

Quos rami fructus, quos ipsa volentia rura
Sponte tulere sua, carpsit; nec ferrea jura,
Insanumque Forum, aut populi tabularia vidit.

Happy, who can of things the causes learn!
The broods of Fear, Fate inexorable;
Acheron's greedy roar beneath his feet he casts.
Blest, too, is he who knows the rural gods,
Pan, Sylvanus old, and the sister Nymphs!

. . . . . .

What fruits the boughs, what ready fields themselvs
Of their free will may yield, he joyful reaps,
Nor laws of iron, nor Forum frantic,
Nor people's courts is he fated to see.

—Virgil, G., 2, 480.

COMMENTARIES.

1. Writing, in 1868, "on the origin and genealogy of the human race," I insisted upon the extraordinary importance of this circumstance, and declared that we must accordingly "regard the Amphioxus with special veneration as that animal which alone of all extant animals can enable us to form an approximate conception of our earliest Silurian vertebrate ancestors." This proposition has given very great offense, not only to unscientific theologians, but also to many others, especially such philosophers as still cherish the anthropocentric error, and who look on man as the foreordained object of "creation," and as the true final cause of all terrestrial life. The "dignity of humanity," it was said by a church newspaper, is, by such a statement as mine, "trodden under foot, and the divine rational conscience of man grievously hurt."

This indignation at my honest and deep respect for the Amphioxus, I am free to confess, is quite incomprehensible to me. If, on entering a grove of ancient oaks, we express reverence for those venerable trees, the life of which has endured a thousand years, no one thinks that unnatural. Yet how high above the oak does the Amphioxus, or even the Ascidian organization, stand in this respect! And what are a thousand years of life of a venerable oak compared with the many millions of years, the history of which is told us by the Amphioxus! But apart from all this, the Amphioxus (skulless, brainless, and memberless as it is) deserves all respect as being of our own flesh and blood!—Haeckel's Evolution of Man (end of vol. i).

2. Now, as to the third test, that there are no other causes competent to explain the phenomena, I explained to you that one should be able to say of a hypothesis that no other known causes than those supposed by it are competent to give rise to the phenomena. Here, I think, Mr. Darwin's view is pretty strong. I really believe that the alternativ is either Darwinism or nothing, for I do not know of any rational conception or theory of the organic universe which has any scientific position at all beside Mr. Darwin's. I do not know of any proposition that has been put before us with the intention of explaining the phenomena of organic nature which has in its favor a thousandth part of the evidence which may be adduced in favor of Mr. Darwin's views. Whatever may be the objections to his views, certainly all others are absolutely out of court.—Prof. Huxley on Origin of Species (Humboldt Library, No. 16, p. 21).

THE LESSON.

In our last lesson it was shown that constructiv Liberalism was not only affirmativ, but triumphant, in its explanation of the beginning and growth of vegetable and animal life. Theology, on the contrary, can giv no definition of life or account of its various forms and of their origin. Its idea of "creation" is unthinkable and without a single fact to rest upon, for no instance of it has ever been known. Theology has nothing to present but nescience, braggadocio, and imposture. But evolution in Biology, on the contrary, is no longer a hypothesis, but a discovery, a true theory, which places all former science on the subject as much behind our age as the Ptolemaic system of astronomy is in contrast with the Copernican. Since the publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species" in 1871 the tide of confirmation from multitudinous facts has risen stronger and higher year by year. Finally the full and clear statement of the new theory in Haeckel's works, now well translated (published by D. Appleton & Co., of New York), leaves no excuse for future ignorance. The "mysteries" of life that perplexed the greatest intellects of the past are now open to every intelligent reader. In no way has Liberalism proved itself more constructiv than in these very arcana of nature. This organic or protoplasmic world, as it now lies revealed to us in its laws and processes, is a source of wonder, delight, and even of sympathetic triumph to every emancipated mind.

Never forget its three grand divisions:

1. There is the kingdom or domain of the Protists, those simpler organisms of protoplasm which literally exist everywhere about us. The earth, the air, the water, and even our own bodies may be said to swarm with them. The microscope reveals to us an ever-present world of minute organisms which rivals in interest and is practically more important to us than the starry systems shown by the telescope in infinit space.

2. Out of these protists, on one side, Vegetable Forms hav arisen, clothing the earth with verdure, beauty, and food. They, as well as the protists, can feed upon and assimilate directly from the inorganic world the materials of which they are composed. They grow up out of the earth, and its disintegrated materials and juices are the materials of their growth.

3. But from the other side of the common protist world Animals hav as certainly originated. They are said to differ principally from plants in their ability to move, to feed only on food that has been organized, i. e., on plants or animals, and in the fact that they breathe or giv out oxygen, instead of carbonic acid gas, as animals are supposed to do.

This distinction between plants and animals seems plain enough at first, but when both are traced up to their origin among the protists the distinction fades out and is lost. No test by which plant may be distinguished from animal will hold good in the world of protists, in which both hav their common origin.

The more practical distinction is simply that the animal has an internal stomach of some kind in which the food upon which it livs is deposited. From this food he sustains his life. His organs are distributed around or in relation to this stomach and its consequent alimentary canal so as to enable life to be fed from it. His limbs are disposed so as to enable him to supply this stomach and to escape or defend himself while so doing. The plant has no stomach or similar organ, but uses the soil as its food store. Its mother Earth is its only feeder and nurse. It needs not to move, but only to liv and die on her bosom. Plant life is therefore little more than the simple development of tissues from the soil and air in which it grows. It may acquire a slight motion or, like Venus's fly-trap, catch a few insects, but hardly for nutrition.

On the contrary, the animal carries its soil or food from which it livs within a stomach which soon becomes an ever-gnawing organ, and which he can only fill by almost constantly moving about. This motion thus caused is increased and preserved by "natural selection." The better the food, the better the nutrition; hence the higher the organism, hence the selection of organized food only; hence the greatly increased locomotion as a means of obtaining it, further constantly improved by selection and the survival of those who become the fittest, that is, the most able to obtain the best food. This fundamental difference that the plant has the external and stationary earth for its stomach, while the animal has his own stomach and assimilates his food from within him, implies all the great distinctions in the lives of each.

If this suggestion is grasped, the physiology and anatomy of both plants and animals are quite easily unfolded and understood by any one who will take up Haeckel's books and read them with the help of any good work on vegetable and animal physiology. No fairy tale can possibly be half as interesting as this story of unfolding life, to say nothing of its practical utility, which cannot be overestimated. It is well known that our diseases, our health, foods, business, diversions, sympathies, indeed, our whole lives, are dependent upon these protists, vegetables, and animals, to which in our origin we are allied. They are now shown to be our next of kin for good or ill. If we cut their acquaintance and ignore them, they will hav their revenge upon our ignorance. We can only liv by having a practical knowledge of the laws of their life and growth from the simplest protists up to Man himself.

Now by way of warning and distinguishing between theory and hypothesis on this subject let us refer again to some of the difficulties that the modern Biology meets with among the people. The chief of these is the persistent cry that "Evolution" is only a hypothesis and not a proved scientific theory. The theological creationists hav a tremendous interest at stake in keeping up this impression, but to continue to do it longer is sure proof of atrocious ignorance or fraud. The Theory of Evolution is demonstrated by the best evidence, that is, all the evidence that the theory requires, and it has no theory whatever against it.

People are often misled, and perhaps designedly, in regard to the kind and extent of the proof required to establish this theory. It is not necessary to prove the descent of every species from another or from a common genus; it is only necessary to make out one case, and then the law of evidence and inference is that all other species hav followed the same law in their origination. All that Newton did was to prove that the law of falling bodies on the earth could be applied to explain the moon's orbit. That one fact established the law of gravity. The application of that law has been the work of all subsequent astronomers, and will be for ages.

The fact of Evolution has been proved far more abundantly than Newton proved the law of gravity, and it stands as a valid theory. Haeckel has established it as a fact beyond question in the descent of the sponges. Darwin has done it in regard to pigeons and nearly all of our domesticated plants and animals. Huxley and Marsh hav done it in regard to the horse. These simple instances would be enough, but they could be added to by hundreds, and are increasing yearly as the records of organic life past and present are compared. The missing links come to light in the most unexpected places. Science finds her treasures in the "Bad Lands" and in the frozen islands of the Arctic, where, as Nordenskjold reports, the shores are strewn with the fossil remains of apparently tropical animals. But these treasures, though useful to make out the several instances, are no longer needed to prove the theory. That has been done, and there is no scientific hypothesis whatever against it. It is only necessary that it should be able to stand alone, and it is as firm as a rock, for there is no opponent. The creationists hav not a single fact. The Spiritualists hav indeed tried to aid them by "materializing" into existence an occasional egg or a potato! But even that fraud has exploded, and there is nothing left of the hypothesis of creation except its unblushing assumption. There is not the slightest proof that a single thing on the face of the earth has ever been "created." Until such an instance is found, is there any alternativ but assumption or silence?

But while this is true, the distinction is to be made between the theory itself and the tracing of the descent of the several species under it, which can generally be done only by the aid of hypothesis. That man is descended from former anthropoid animals we know by this law. Because, for instance, we can trace the steps by which the horse has descended from former hippoid ancestors, and can also trace the steps in the history of other species and varieties, we establish the law of descent and heredity as the great law of Biology. But in the case of Man, Haeckel can only trace, and only pretends to trace, the twenty-two steps of human descent hypothetically. This is a proper use of hypothesis in applying a general and verified theory. In all of the multitude of plants and animals it would be ridiculous to say that the law of Evolution had not been proved until the descent of every species and variety had been actually verified in all of the links. It would be just as reasonable to expect astronomers to giv us at once a complete table of every asteroid or comet or else to giv up the law of gravity. Modern Biologists hav demonstrated the law as above stated, and now their principal business is to apply it to the explanation of the organic world, and this can only be done gradually, by getting all the links possible, and supplying the missing ones by scientific hypothesis, as the missing vertebræ or limbs of a fossil skeleton are generally supplied. By doing this Haeckel has largely completed the line of human descent, and with great probability as to its general correctness. Future researches may show that he has made some errors in his twenty-two steps. It would be strange if at this early stage of the application of the General Law to so complicated a mass of facts he has been able to giv every twig correctly in the branching tree of life. He makes no such claim, but he does giv a very probable working hypothesis, and to thus lead us toward the truth is the best of aids for those who wish to find it. It is truth that sheds the light by which truth is discovered, or, in the memorable maxim of old Lucretius,

"Truth holds the torch in the search for truth."

There is another common misapprehension that the general student of Evolution should escape from as soon as possible. It is to the effect that because all animals are in some way related by evolution therefore they hav all descended in a direct chain from each other. The links of the human chain are only about twenty-two, but the side relativs upon each link are numberless. The true links are probably indicated by the Embryology of Man, and that science has enabled Haeckel to trace in nature the approximate order of succession in the animal ancestry of Man. The direct line of descent is thus indicated: Protoplasm, the Protists, Worms, Tunicates (and the Amphioxus), Vertebrates, Selacian fishes, Amphibia, the gilled and lunged

Batrachians, the Amniota, the Marsupials, the Lemurs, the Apes, Man. In this way we find that the actual line of descent has left on one side the larger part of animal life, for example, the mollusks, insects, higher fishes, reptils, birds, quadrupeds, and the broad-nosed apes of America. In order to get this misapprehension corrected by a true notion of the real body of our "Tree of Life," let the reader, before going through Haeckel's work in detail, examin carefully the table and plate at pages 44 and 188 of his second volume. The rest of the book can be better read afterward as an explanation of those tables and plates, which present an epitome of the whole story.

Another false notion we hav mentioned before needs to be here specially guarded against, and it (alas!) is not prevalent among the uneducated alone. It is the attempt to extend and apply the processes and Law of Evolution outside of the protoplasmic world. Thus the Universe, or Solar System, or the Earth, or Inorganic Matter, is said to hav evolved! This attempt has done more than anything else to discredit the whole Theory of Evolution. Everybody knows that stones do not grow; that crystals and solar systems are formed by aggregation from without; and that all of the changes of inorganic matter occur without that internal assimilation, reaction, and cellular growth which is the main fact and constant process in evolution or development. These last two words hav no true or proper meaning or use except when applied to the growth and succession of changes in the organic world. If they are used below that world, as they are, in regard to inorganic matter, they must be regarded as a figure of speech, or else a misleading analogy, for there is no relation of cause and effect, nor homology, nor comparable likeness between the aggregations and changes of inorganic matter and the internal cell growths of protists, vegetables, and animals causing their enlargement and change from within.

The "Evolution" Philosophy of Herbert Spencer is a lamentable instance of this attempt to bridge the two worlds of matter and life by a law that applies only to the latter. The only bridge between those two worlds is the Law of Correlation and Equivalence of Forces. The ever-varying forms of the "Nebular Hypothesis" (if any one can now tell what that is) plays an important part in all extensions of this kind. But however our solar system came to be formed—whether by condensing gases, or coalescing of meteoric matter, or aggregation of comets—evidently has nothing to do with Evolution in Biology, where only the word originated and scientifically belongs. Mr. Spencer's philosophy is grand in all the biological and social sciences, but it cannot be applied in astronomy, physics, or chemistry, except by figurativ speech.

Nor should it be taken for granted too suddenly that our Earth was ever all at once a molten mass, so that life or protoplasm may not hav existed upon it indefinitly. The fact is that mankind are only slightly acquainted with one earth and one solar system, and some philosophers are drawing immense conclusions from that slight acquaintance. If planets and solar systems could be compared, observed, and manipulated in vast numbers, as protoplasmic bodies and processes hav been by our modern Biologists, we might place similar confidence in our Cosmologists. But it is clear that the "genesis of worlds" has yet to be observed; till then, "growth" should be applied only to organic bodies and social organisms.

In so far as Haeckel seems to giv countenance to the nebular or "nebulous" cosmogony, it should be understood as borrowed only and in no wise related to the biological Evolution he so admirably investigates and expounds.

It only remains to apply the Law of Evolution to Mankind.

Of the existence of protoplasm as the first round of the vital ladder there is no doubt. From this simple life-bearing and life-producing substance up to Man, "the paragon of animals, the beauty of the world; in action like an angel, in apprehension like a God," Haeckel takes us by simple stages from age to age of animal evolution and geological development. First he shows the simple unnucleated plasm. From its simple uncelled state he shows that cells are formed as in the case of the "Monera" and simple Amœbæ.

From these simple-celled organisms arise the little many-celled organisms, as the Synamœbæ. (See vol. ii, p. 189.)

From those spring the organisms with an inner and outer skin (exo and ento-derm), which is the first basis of the beginning of a stomach, as for example in the Gastrœdæ. From those stomached animals come the worms, the Tunicata, and the Ascidians. From thence the rudimentary corded or back-boned animals, as the Amphioxus, and the headless and jawless vertebrates.

From thence the primitiv fishes; from thence the true fishes and the amphibia, the reptils and birds.

From the Amphibia and Reptils, the Primitiv Mammals, the pouched and beaked animals are traced.

From thence the Placentals, Lemuroids, and Semi-Apes.

From thence the Apes, the Chimpanzee, Gibbon, Gorilla, and Orang.

From thence the Ape-like men, or speechless men, (Alali) and MAN.

These stages are fully illustrated and explained by Prof. Haeckel in twenty-two steps, passing through five geological epochs. Thus the origin and history of Mankind as a race are traced out and we hav their Phylogeny, or tribe genealogy. But this is but the first half of the argument.

To confirm and explain this tribal history of Man Haeckel takes up Embryology and givs the history of the growth of the individual man before birth. He shows that it is a condensed but wonderful repetition of this tribal history. "Nomine mutato de te fabula narratur"—"Change but the name and of thee the story is told"—is his enforcement of the story of all animal evolution. This he is enabled to do by proving that the growth of every animal before birth is a substantial passing throngh of each of the stages of animal life; and that Man, as the highest developed of animals, passes through every one of these stages previous to his birth. Man is thus seen to be the epitome of animal life, because nearly all of the animal kingdom below him may be considered as arrested stages of his own development.

That this wonderful similarity in the stages of the tribal and individual development is wholly accidental is not supposable. Still more foolish would it be for "creativ design" to hav taken "with malice aforethought" such a long, tedious, and painful way of getting us here. There is evidently some relation of cause and effect between the general development of the animal world and of the individual man—that is, in Haeckel's phrase, between phylogeny and ontogeny,

What is this relation? Few questions hav been more interesting or puzzling. Several hypothetical answers hav been given, for example, in Darwin's suggestion of "Pangenesis" and Herbert Spencer's "Physiological Units." They both seem to lead the following hypothesis:

If we could hav the patience to follow the growth of the individual embryo through the ways and phases by which it could be affected by the previous tribal history of the parents, the "mystery" may disappear. The fact is that in all organisms high enough to hav an inside and outside skin (ento and exo-derm) the female germ or ovum must in concertion assimilate the sperm or male germ, or both melt and are lost. If they do meet and mingle, growth commences, and that growth is continued by material furnished from the blood of the mother until birth. But the blood of the mother contains all of the materials which the tribe in its growth has stored up. This is evident from the fact that the stages of animal growth are successiv and cumulativ. The first stages are truly called vegetativ, and are little more than exosmosis and assimilation. The subsequent stages of animal growth are more complex, but succeed each other and all remain. The blood is fed by the disintegration of every part of the system, and so contains the molecules that hav been used in every part and stage of the animal's growth. Now when the egg is given off from the ovarium of the female, what happpens to it? It meets and can assimilate only the materials that will combine with it. The egg can therefore take nourishment from, or assimilate only with, the substances that are suited to it; and in the same order in which the egg or embrio advances through its stages of growth will it take up the molecules that were deposited in the parent's body during its tribal history in the very same order in which those were deposited; for it is only in that order that they will be assimilable and able to nourish the new growth. And still further it is evident that the fetus will generally assume the same form that the tribal parent had during each of those stages; for the similar process of assimilation will form in a similar manner, and thus produce a similar animal shape. Man is the highest form of animal growth, and will therefore present a fetus growing successivly through each of the stages of general life—that is, his ontogeny will be a picture of his phylogeny. This is the fact, and the result could be no other upon this hypothesis of Cellular Genesis. This hypothesis seems to cover the whole difficulty, for by following the capacities of the egg or cells to take their proper nourishment according to their stage of growth, the individual is linked in all its growth to the stages of the general animal growth that hav successivly provided that nourishment, and in the very same order.

Even after birth man's growth is in a similar way socially continued by the individual through all the stages of the social development of the human race from savagery to civilization. He as a child assimilates and passes through the culture of the several stages of the social progress of his race, and in no small degree repeats it. In so doing he can assimilate as he progresses only the thoughts and feelings suitable to his stage of growth. The girl takes to her dolls, Achilles to his arms. Thus man is the microcosm of his biological and social macrocosm, i. e., of his phylogeny—of his whole race from its very beginning.

The difficulties that this simple hypothesis removes are very great. For example, it has been supposed that the human egg must hav some peculiarities in its protoplasm containing the wonderful human capabilities of the future man all wrapped up in its own simple little self. But the finest microscope, and all tests, show that this little cell differs perceptibly in no way from any other germ cell except in the capacity of assimilating the human male sperm, which is probably more like itself than any other, and so more assimilable. The capacities which this cell afterward develops were not at all in it at the beginning of this growth any more than the man is in the child. For instance, the oak tree is not at all in the acorn, but the multiplication, by repetition of or growth from the germ-cell of the acorn finally builds the oak out of its nourishment in the environment under which that growth goes on. So it is with the growth and heredity of all organic life, vegetable or animal, before birth or after. The initiativ given by the male at the early stage of the germ growth givs it the conditions and warp under which the material from the blood and nerves of the mother is afterward assimilated. This also may well account for the heredity from both parents. The predominating influence at this early period may indeed determin the sex.

Man, then, before birth, is the repetition of his race in small; after birth the repetition of his progress toward civilization occurs in a similar way. In body, mind, and soul he is simply a child of Humanity—his true creator.

Again, by the aid of this working hypothesis, we may at this early stage of our lessons gain some definitions that will help us ever after. What is "life," "mind," "soul," etc.? Prof. Allman, in his able address on "Protoplasm," before the last meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, seemed to infer that we ought to find what are called "mind" and "soul" in these little cells of protoplasm, from which all human beings grow. For if mind and soul were not there at the beginning, how did they ever get into them or the embryo afterward? How is it that one of these little cells develops into a worm, another into a dog, and another into a Man? How is it that one of these has more of a soul than the other, and how and where did he get it?

The answer upon the above Cellular Genesis hypothesis is quite simple.

The cells belonging to the simpler forms of organisms hav life only, not mind, and much less soul, as even Prof. Haeckel seems to suppose. Mind and soul are the inherited results of the disciplin and selection of the higher systems of the higher animals. Thus the process of simple reaction is life, as in the Amœbæ. The process of complex reflex nervous action, called thinking, is mind, as in the Dog or Ape. The processes of thought and feeling as to what is good and evil, or right and wrong, under the relations of human society, and especially a society under imagined gods, may be called the soul. Thus all organisms hav life. The higher animals hav also mind. Human beings only hav also souls. It follows that their souls are really large in proportion as they hav attained to altruistic instincts, sentiments, and motivs. Thus, too, our theory scientifically explains how it is that some human specimens hav souls so very small, and yet liv and think. These definitions are similar to those found in Aristotle's Treatis on the Soul, which suggests them, and to which your attention is requested.

Let us close this lesson with our usual glance at the emotional side, or the esthetics, of our subject. It is evident that the demonstrated kinship of man with the vegetable and animal world around him, and upon which he is wholly dependent for life, weaves new bonds of sympathy and recognition between him and them. Pastoral poetry speaks with renewed charms. "The self-same power that brought me here brought also you," is the voice from the rose and rhododendron. The animals which hav been domesticated, and hav now no possible safety in life apart from human uses or fancy, become his sacred wards. In their affection and service to Man he may well recognize, as Comte has done, the miniature "soul" that may well giv them precedence over the drones and unaltruistic human specimens.

Under this new view of life, too, we cannot but read and cherish the works of those poets who hav interpreted rural life to us. No lofty flight of poetic fancy will sever us from the earth and the earthly, from which the power that sustains our flight must come. The homely employments and virtues of rural life hav ever been and must ever be the nursery of all that is really good or great in Man. We can never outgrow those who hav consecrated it for us—our Hesiod and Theoctritus, Columella and Virgil, Æsop and La Fontaine, Spencer and Gay, Bloomfield and Thompson, Cowper and Burns, nor less our consecrativ Bryant and Whittier.

It is a singular and noteworthy fact that the word law, as a moral and social order, does not appear in Homer, nor, as I remember in that sense, in the Bible. It first comes to light in the rural life described in the Works and Days of Hesiod. It is to that life that we owe this fundamental step in social progress.

The text given from Virgil is in the same line of thought, and becomes truer as Science advances year by year.

As an instance of how we may find the lessons and law for the greatest in the lives of the least, the Beehives and the single Bee may teach as well.

Each for all, and all for each,
From each according to his capacity,
To each according to his need.

Cheerful work and subordination, then, accords with the duty to be done. Such are the intimations of comparativ sociology from that humble source, and they make the Beehive and its inhabitants the best introduction to our next lesson (the origin of human sociology) we hav as yet, notwithstanding all that our greatest philosophers hav said or done.

How true this bee lesson is let Langstroth or some other bee book prove to you. You will find no novel more surprising.

The following bits of poetry may also help to increase your interest. It will be noted that Shakspere speaks of the "King" and "Emperor" of the hive, but to make his simile conform to the facts, as since discovered, you will hav to read Queen and Empress instead. There is nothiug to correct in the song of our own sainted Alice Cary. It teaches that man, like the bee, should liv at once for his Queen and his Hive, and how that becomes the charm and attraction which turns work to play.

THE BEEHIVE AS A MODEL STATE.

So work the honey-bees;
Creatures that by a rule in nature teach
The art of order to a peopled kingdom.
They hav a King, and officers of sorts;
Where some, like magistrates, correct at home;
Others, like merchants, venture trade abroad;
Others, like soldiers, armed in their stings,
Make boot upon the summer's velvet buds;
Which pillage they with merry march bring home,
To the tent-royal of their Emperor,
Who, busied in his majesty, surveys
The singing masons building roofs of gold;
The civil citizens kneading up the honey;
The poor mechanic porters crowding in
Their heavy burdens at his narrow gate;
The sad-eyed justice, with his surly hum,
Delivering o'er to executors pale
The lazy, yawning drone.—Shakspere, Henry V., i, 2.

TO A HONEY-BEE.

"Busy-body, busy-body,
Always on the wing,
Wait a bit, where you hav lit,
And tell me why you sing."

Up and in the air again,
Flap, flap, flap!
And now she stops, and now she drops
Into the rose's lap.

"Come, just a minute come,
From your rose so red."
Hum, hum, hum, hum—
That was all she said.

Busy-body, busy-body,
Always light and gay,
It seems to me, for all I see,
Your work is only play.

And now the day is sinking to
The goldenest of eves,
And she doth creep for quiet sleep
Among the lily leaves.

"Come, just a moment come,
From your snowy bed,"
Hum, hum, hum, hum—
That was all she said.

But, the while I mused, I learned
The secret of her way:
Do my part with cheerful heart,
And turn my work to play.—Alice Cary.

Notes by the Way.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since I wrote you last I hav visited Concord, Homer, Tekonsha, Union City, Sherwood, Colon, and Athens, working earnestly in the interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER and of the National Liberal League.

I hav visited the higher schools in each of these places where I hav found them in session, and hav been very kindly and respectfully received; in fact I hav been so much in the habit of visiting the schools in southern Michigan during the last quarter of a century and speaking briefly to the scholars that I should almost feel the loss of a great pleasure if I were deprived of the privilege, now that I am dropping my professional occupation as a dentist.

I hav received quite a fair list of new trial subscribers in each of the above-named places, and I hav been received with more courtesy and cordiality than I had really anticipated when I set out to work directly in the cause of Liberalism and Freethought.

In my visits at the schools I do not speak directly upon any phase of Freethought, but rather confine myself to general remarks bearing upon educational matters and upon the sociabilities and friendships or fraternal interests which belong in common to all well-bred, civilized, and enlightened peoples. And I hav a large number of original poems thoroughly committed to memory which I can recite, thus giving examples in elocution. And sometimes I read some choice selections from other authors. In these ways I hav had the privilege of occupying a passing hour in the schools of southern Michigan for more than twenty years, and my visits hav uniformly and without exception been well received for a thousand times and through all these years.

I hav met with many interesting incidents, episodes, and experiences among the people as I pass from place to place. I find myself in the midst of little groups of people of both sexes and of all ages from day to day and hour to hour, and I am almost constantly lecturing or talking upon subjects connected with the prospectiv enlightenment and improvement of the race in both a religious and political aspect, as well as social, financial, and all other forms and phases of reform and advancement, which, as I apprehend, THE TRUTH SEEKER anticipates and labors to bring about.

We will clear away the rubbish of ignorance and superstition, and then erect a superstructure of fraternity, equality, and universal peace and happiness.

Respectfully, C. S. ROWLEY.

Editorial.

A Visit to Washington.

We helped to make up the hundred thousand persons who journeyed to the capital of our country to attend the inauguration of President Garfield. It was not that we felt anxious to witness the inauguration ceremony of swearing in a new President that we made the trip so much as to avail ourselvs of the low fares to visit the seat of government where we had never been. We left here on the evening of Thursday, the 3d inst., and found we had a large number of fellow-passengers. The train was a full one, and we were an hour or two late in arriving there the next morning. It snowed some three inches in depth in the night, and toward morning it turned to rain. In a few hours it partially cleared off, and by noon the snow had disappeared.

In company with a friend we visited the Capitol and witnessed the military procession escorting Hayes and Garfield in an open carriage along Pennsylvania avenue from the White House to the Capitol. The inaugurating ceremony was set for 12 M. At 11 the crowd had gathered in large numbers on the east front of the Capitol, and for an hour and a half it became more dense and extended.

At 12:30, after a meeting had been held in the Senate chamber, the new President, accompanied by the retiring one, Chief-Justice Waite, members of the Cabinet, Senators, Representativs, and many other distinguished personages, among whom may be named Mr. Garfield's mother, wife, and children, Mrs. Hayes and children, Gen. Hancock, and Col. R. G. Ingersoll, emerged from the Senate chamber and appeared upon the platform in front of the Capitol, when one President quietly laid aside the paraphernalia of office and became a private citizen and another citizen became the chief officer in a nation of fifty millions. The ceremony was an imposing one. More than fifty thousand people could easily see Mr. Garfield while he was delivering his inaugural address and taking the oath, but only a comparativly small number could understand his remarks.

The return to the White House was an imposing military display. Several companies preceded the carriage containing the old and new Presidents, and some twenty thousand soldiers in the richest uniforms, and from all parts of the country, followed, with bands of musicians well interspersed. It took fully two hours for the military, civil companies, and clubs to pass a given point. Pennsylvania avenue was literally packed with human beings. Ten thousand or more were comfortably seated on the long elevated seats put up for the occasion all along the route. Tens of thousands of flags, large and small, and of every conceivable style, were seen on the avenue, and, in fact, in every street in the city. The town was indeed profusely decorated, and looked like a flower garden in full bloom. Some of the public buildings were intricately and elaborately decorated with the national colors, combined in wreaths, links, and chains, portraits of distinguished characters, etc. This was particularly observable on the Pension building, which afforded a rich study.

While quietly watching the pageant of the inauguration of Gen. Garfield the great change that has been made in our country in eighty years was easily realized. When plain Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated but few person were in attendance; no great display of military, no gorgeous escort, and nothing of the kind. When the oath had been administered he quietly mounted his horse and rode off by himself to his residence, with no grand and expensiv parade. But he was an honest, true man, and made an excellent President. In keeping with the change that has been made since his day, what may we expect in another century?

Perhaps the greatest curiosity of the day was to walk along Pennsylvania avenue and look at the tens of thousands of people, every window, door, hundreds of seats, some of them hundreds of feet in length, the sidewalks, and even the streets, being literally packed with animated and enthusiastic men and women. At the intersection of many of the principal streets arches or spans of iron tubing were erected and well-covered with the national colors and the coats of arms of the several states. Every state was thus represented.

In the evening the extensiv grounds of the White House were illuminated with many hundreds of Chinese lanterns of various colors, which in the aggregate presented a magnificent appearance. The fireworks, near the Treasury building, were very fine, and were probably witnessed by more than 100,000 people. An appropriation of several thousand dollars had been made for the fireworks alone, and the display of rockets, Roman candles, national pieces, etc., were in proportion.

A principal feature of the evening was the inauguration ball held in the new Museum building of the Smithsonian Institute. As the building covers over three acres, and the series of rooms being divided by rows of columns, the space was ample for the eight thousand persons reported to hav congregated within its walls. Fine music was dispensed by an orchestra of one hundred and fifty performers. The new President gave a reception in the Museum building in the earlier part of the evening, when thousands had the opportunity of shaking him by the hand, after which "the dance went on," and continued till morning. The immense hall was finely decorated, and everything was gay and festiv. Our dancing days being over we did not attend the ball.

On Saturday we were occupied in visiting the public or department buildings, and were much interested in what we saw. The Capitol is one of the largest and finest structures in the world. Its entire length must be nearly eight hundred feet. It does not cover so much ground as the Vatican or St. Peter's at Rome, but is much finer in appearance than the Vatican, and is not surpassed by St. Peter's in external appearance, though that church undoubtedly cost five times as much as the Capitol—a sum of $60,000,000.

We visited the House of Representativs while in session in its last hours, on Friday morning. The immense pile, including its dome, the rotunda, the chambers, the library, and the many apartments, is worthy of a full description, but in this brief notice we will not attempt it.

The department buildings are probably larger and finer than any other government buildings in the world. The State Department building is a marvel of size, beauty, and richness. Dean Stanley pronounced it the finest governmental building in the world. It is not yet completed, one large wing or division being in course of construction. The main business of the War and Navy departments is located in the same immense structure.

The Treasury building is of immense size, with large, fluted, monolith granit columns at the entrances, and is thoroughly occupied with busy clerks and eager applicants. In wandering through the immense corridors and numerous offices much of interest is to be seen. We saw some of the vaults where the money of the nation is deposited. We were informed that over $300,000,000 in bonds were in the vaults, with half as much in money—largely gold and silver.

The Life-Saving department, in the upper portion of the building, where are exhibited the approved modes by which persons on wrecked vessels are rescued, is an interesting place to visit. The attendant described how by means of one approved apparatus nearly ten thousand persons hav been rescued within seven or eight years. A cord attached to a weight, which is fired over the wreck a few hundred feet distant, falls upon the vessel, by the means of which a large rope is drawn to the wreck and is secured. This forms the line or bridge on which a boat or peculiar carriage suspended on pulleys is pulled by strong cords to and from the wreck, conveying at each trip from the wreck to the shore eight persons, thus saving them from a watery grave.

The Rogues' Gallery, where hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of the portraits of forgers, counterfeiters, and other criminals are kept, attracted much attention.

The Patent Office is a large, magnificent granit structure. The thousands upon thousands of its models for all possible inventions, machines, and appliances, classified and arranged in acres of upright glass cases, required far more time for inspection than it was possible to devote to them.

Opposit the Patent Office stands the General Post-Office, which is also a magnificent edifice. It requires a great number of clerks to attend to the details of the public business in the different departments. We were informed that not less than ten thousand clerks are thus employed, one-third of whom are females. Between 8 and 9 A M. they may be seen going to their several posts, and at 4 P.M. their day's service is over. On Saturdays they stop at three.

We visited the building in the southern part of the city where the bank notes, stamps, etc., are engraved and printed, but the visitors were so numerous we could not wait for our turn to look through.

The Agricultural buildings and department were next visited, where grains, seeds, fruits, nuts, vegetables, cones, woods, the products from which textils are made, are seen in large numbers, as well as everything pertaining to botany and vegetable growths of all kinds. Flowers, fruits, and vegetables are beautifully represented by counterfeits in wax.

The Smithsonian Institute is a most interesting place to visit. The museum contains curiosities of all kinds, including nearly the entire animal kingdom, either in skeleton or stuffed, from the largest saurians and monsters of prehistoric times down to the minutest animals. The pottery, idols, stone and bone implements, and articles of copper and bronze once used by the former inhabitants of this continent in the long past form a vast and interesting collection. The mineralogical collection is very extensiv and fine. America equals the world in its ores and mines. The figures and heads of the aborigines of the country, as well as the Asiatic nations, are a conspicuous feature. The pottery and arts of different ages and nations are well represented. The models of ancient cities built upon the elevated rock plateaus of New Mexico and Central America are worthy of close attention and study. One cannot look through the extensiv museum without blessing the memory of James Smithson, who founded the Institute.

The Art Gallery, containing a good collection of statuary and paintings, the bequest of the rich Washington banker Corcoran, is well worth visiting. The former are principally plaster copies of the marble statues of Paris, Rome, and Naples. Among them we recognized many that are to be seen on the other side of the Atlantic. Many of the paintings are very fine, and compare favorably with the larger European collections.

The Washington Monument was visited, and the nearly three hundred steps were climbed to the top, from which a splendid view of Georgetown, the Potomac, Arlington Hights, the city, and the surrounding country is obtained. Including the base, the tower has reached nearly two hundred feet in hight, to which nearly four hundred feet more are to be added. It is fifty-four feet square at the base, and tapers very gradually upward. It is built of hewn blocks of marble and granit six, eight, and ten feet in length and two feet in thickness. Marble is used on the outer side and granit on the inner. Carved and engraved stones, with appropriate sentiments, from the different states, Masonic and civic societies, are in the inner surface of the tower, and are inspected with interest as one climbs upward. The heavy stones for the structure are hoisted on an elevator by steam. When completed the monument will be nearly six hundred feet in hight, the tallest monument or structure in the world. The stones are now being hewn for the work, and the laying will be resumed in a few weeks. It will require several years to complete it, and will cost a vast sum of money.

After becoming thoroughly wearied a friend took us in his carriage over the principal streets of the city, where are located the residences of the aristocracy, the foreign ministers, senators, etc. We also saw several fine bronze equestrian statues, of Generals Washington, Scott, McPherson, Thomas, and others. Washington has unusually wide and smoothly paved streets, wide sidewalks, etc. The pavement of the streets is largely asphalt-concrete, varying in composition in different localities. The city presents a very clean appearance, and is far more quiet than noisy New York.

We viewed with considerable pleasure the public buildings and property in which we hav a fifty-millionth interest, but called upon neither the retiring nor incoming President. We hav no objections to R. B. Hayes retiring to private life, and he cannot hav our respect in doing so. We cannot forget that he possessed not the justice and honor to release us from unjust imprisonment, when on more than one occasion he had promised to do so. He had not the firmness and justice to do what he knew was right. We shall hardly forget his very pious, very bigoted, and very cruel-hearted wife, who in carrying out the intolerant principles of her religion went far out of her way to insist upon the continued imprisonment of an old man who had committed no crime, who had violated no law, but who had been unjustly deprived of his liberty because he presumed to be obnoxious to the hypocritical, intolerant church element. Let the pious pair retire to private life, beloved by bigots, but without the respect of the more liberal portion of the American people. It is to be hoped their successors are superior to them in many respects.

Among the other sights that attracted our attention was Ford's old theater, which we visited, where the good and revered Abraham Lincoln was shot; we also saw the house on the opposit side of the street where he breathed his last.

We passed a pleasant evening with Mr. and Mrs. Burr, and found them very genial people. We called upon Col. R. G. Ingersoll and Mr. C. P. Farrell, but were not fortunate enough to find them in. We met there, however, Mr. W. S. Bush, Mr. Mills, and another gentleman whose name we cannot recall. The interview was a pleasant one.

On Saturday night we returned to our home, well pleased with the visit to the capital of our country.

The Paine Monument.

The little donations for repairing the Paine monument at New Rochelle continue to come in slowly, and will be duly acknowledged in a future issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Mr. Wilson McDonald, the well-known sculptor, of this city, has been added to the Committee having the work in charge, and is Chairman of the same. His efficiency, with the coöperation of Liberal friends, will soon push the work to completion.

In this connection we wish to remark that there is a strong feeling and conviction that a fine monument should be erected to the memory of Thomas Paine in this city. It is proposed to make the monument a colossal bust of Paine in bronze, on a bronze pedestal (this material cannot easily be chipped or marred), and to erect the same in Union Square or Central Park. It is believed that permission can be obtained of the proper authorities for a fine statue of the great man to be thus erected. Thomas Paine assuredly did enough for this country to entitle a monument to him to stand in any park or public square in this country.

It is not proposed to erect this new monument this year, but to hav it completed and in place by the time the World's Exhibition is held in this city in 1883.

Money for this purpose is not asked for now, but expressions of opinion are asked for on the subject, and pledges for the work when the time comes for it to be consummated. Will the friends of Thomas Paine let us hear from them on the subject?

And, by all means, let the small sum required for the reparation of the New Rochelle monument be sent in at an early day. It is a shame for that dilapidated monument of a great and good man to remain as it is three months longer.

Chainey's Lectures.

We hav in pamphlet form three lectures by George Chainey, to wit, his great lecture on "The Clergy;" "Heads and Hearts;" and "Iconoclasm, or, the Church of the Future." Price, 10 cents each, or the three for 25 cents.

It will be remembered that Mr. Chainey is at present giving a series of lectures in Paine Hall, Boston, and from all the accounts we hear, his lectures are meeting with marked success, and he is uniting the various Liberal elements in a harmonious bond. He wishes all the Liberals of the country to belong to his parish, and they can do so by sending him the sum of one dollar, which will entitle them to receive his lectures for a year, one of which will be published weekly. The price is very low, and it is hoped the response will be generous. His address is No. 3 Union Park, Boston, Mass.

Beautiful Pictures of Col. R. G. Ingersoll.

A Liberal friend paints on concave glass (by the aid of photographs) most beautiful pictures of this popular champion of Liberalism. The painting is secure between double crystals, and will not change by age. These will be furnished, securely packed in boxes and mailed, at $2.00 for card size, and $2.75 for cabinet size. Frames of beautiful styles from 25 to 50 cents. Let those who wish for a beautiful picture of the Colonel send for one of these, and they will surely be pleased. Address this office.

MR. J. FRANK BAXTER is lecturing, singing, and giving tests this month before the Second Society of Spiritualists. As a lecturer he probably would not rank as high as some who hav preceded him on the same platform. He is, however, a good elocutionist, though he has a habit of emitting his words with an explosiv distinctness which sometimes becomes monotonous, and there is also danger of losing the thread of his discourse in admiring the graceful manner in which he unwinds it. In the course of his lectures he does not neglect an occasional shot backward at the army of superstition within the church, and forward, so to speak, at the hosts of Materialism. He believes all things possible with spirits, and makes some statements in regard to phenomena in his own experience which many confirmed Spiritualists in his audience can only feel it their duty to take alongside without hoisting aboard. As a singer Mr. Baxter is not inferior to Sankey. But it was the announcement of the tests which he would giv of his mediumship that drew a large audience to hear him last Sunday evening. Verbal communications were received from spirit friends through the speaker, but as they happened to be friends of other persons than those present no one in the audience could feel specially edified by them and no skeptics were convinced. Mr. Baxter has a familiar spirit whom he calls "Atagar," who inspires him to see and say strange things which it is not permitted to others to know.

CONWAY'S CATECHISM (FOR THOSE OF WEAKER CAPACITY).—There is not a sane man or woman who fulfils the duties prescribed in the New Testament.

1. Do those people around us turn the other cheek when one is smitten?

2. Do they refuse to go to law against each other

3. Do they giv the thief another garment when he has stolen one?

4. Do they never ask return of him who has borrowed of them?

5. Do they love their neighbors as themselvs? and sell all they hav to giv it to the poor?

6. Do they hav all things in common?

7. Do they believe their friends and children are totally depraved, and treat them as such?

8. Is it in Christ's spirit when, if a man has taken your cloak, you giv him your cap?

9. Do ordinary Christians lay up no treasures on earth, but only in heaven?

10. Do they liv among their neighbors as if they believed that the millions around them were destined to be tortured in everlasting fires?

11. Do those smiling crowds show the horror, the anguish, which belief would inevitably bring to a heart of ordinary humanity?

12. If these things be right, then is there still none that doeth good—no, not one.

The Infidel Abroad.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We hav just finished re-reading the "Infidel Abroad," and find it even better, as a complete whole, than it was in single letters. I think the general verdict of the world will be that it is thy best work.

Books of travel hav always held a place second only to real scientific works, and this volume of thine is the first one ever written from a real Agnostic standpoint.

It is a precedent that will be followed by many others in the future, but still it will always be first, and consequently it will hav a name and a place no other can ever attain to.

We are all proud that "our Bennett" has done this for Liberalism and Freethought. It reflects a little shine of glory on each and every one of us who look to thee as a leader, a champion, and a friend.

As I run over the "great works" of D. M. Bennett I can but remember how I thought, as each one successivly made its appearance, "Well, this is certainly his chef-d'œuvre," and were it not for the grand prospect of his "trip around the world," I should certainly think now that the topmost hight was climbed. But to "liv and learn" is the motto of all who work for Liberal Freethought, and who shall say when the utmost limit to the grand progress of any mind is reached?

The "Infidel Abroad" should form a part of every family library wherein there is a spark of Liberal feeling.

There are two sides to all questions, and this applies as well to the views a traveler takes of what he sees in foreign lands as it does to any other subject. The grand cathedrals, the ruins of proud and lofty temples dedicated to Jupiter and to the glorious old orb of day, and the little barn-like country churches in the backwoods, each and all hav a different look when seen by eyes blinded and prejudiced by theological and mythological superstitions, and when seen by those cleared and brightened by the pure light of reason's ray, and guided by the plain, practical common sense of the observer.

Mr. Bennett has the rare faculty of endowing others with the power of seeing through his eyes, and no one can follow his steps as he so simply yet graphically describes his journeyings in the great continent across the blue waters without feeling as if they too had been there, and even eaten of the macaroni and given alms to the lazzaroni, as well as beheld the fat, lazy priests at mass, or chanting and singing their pious balderdash to the empty air.

Then, too, you see the mysterious wonders of lace-making, the costly paintings, carvings, and mosaics, and above all the grand and beautiful wonders of nature, from the lowly valleys to the volcano's lofty peak. You wander amid rare and fragrant flowers, green and clinging vines, rich and luscious fruits, gems of silver and gold, and "all that enchantment has told," and even hears the pleading voice of the "captain" as he says, "You no likee me. I likee you same as mine brother; mine home your home, mine wifee your wifee, mine children your children." Or vary the scene by listening to Bennett himself as he pleads for favor with St. Peter, who stands holding up the big key of heaven. And can there be a heaven and no place therein for good men, honest and brave, who only ask for truth, right, and justice? If there is I hope all Infidels abroad and Infidels at home will find a better place than this could possibly be.

But just what I most want is for everybody to send in right off $1.50 for the book and a promise of $5.00 more for the "trip around the world." I believe there are 1,000 Liberals who can do this, and they will never be sorry if they do. Now is the best possible time. Delays are dangerous. Let us work while it is yet day, for we know not what tomorrow may bring forth. So, my friend—thou who readest this—do thy best now.

That Stolen Rib.—Concluded.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE LIBERAL CLUB BY E. BELLE WHITNEY.

Alarmed at the queer turn of things with regard to the removed rib, and fearing her approaching power in the form of help, the creator sought at once to instruct the woman as to her position, her station, and he relati ns to his image. He did not accuse her of disobedience to him, but on approaching her simply said, by way of interrogation, "What hast thou done?" And without accusing her of disobedience at her reply, attaching all blame to the serpent and exonerating the godly image, the creator proceeded at once to pass sentence on the accused man by informing her that she must be subject to the man; she was made for his help, and must honor and obey him, be subject to and be ruled by him. And as if indignant at her assurance, added a punishment to the labors the godly image had put upon her as his help by saying, "In great sorrow shalt thou bear children. No deep sleep shall fall on thee for parturition." "What, thou too, Brute? then will Cæsar fall." Then, turning to the serpent, the creator proceeded to pass sentence on him for his familiarity to his son's servant, and said, "For this thou shalt crawl and eat dust all the days of thy life."

The organ of speech, the channel throrgh which thought is conveyed and thereby much harm done, having already been found detrimental to the godly image, must hav been by the creator at once silenced in the serpent, as he has never been known to utter an articulate sound since the memorable and fatal chat with the godly image's first servant. His only expression of thought is made known by a hiss of contempt or defiance. Man being left by the creator to deal as he pleased with the woman by way of disciplin, fearing her desire for power, forced on her the punishment of the serpent by commanding her to silence.

From Adam to the prese nt time silence is enjoined on the women as a divine command. Solomon called talkativ women brawlers and likened them to the continual dropping of rain. St. Paul urged Titus to disciplin the women to silence that the word of God might not be blasphemed. He also instructed the Corinthians to keep their women down to silence, for, said he, "the word of God is not out of them." The fundamental principle of all republics is free speech for godly images, and silence for all representativs of the removed rib as the safety-valve of Christian civilization. The clergy throughout Christendom, governed by these Bible injunctions, forbid woman to enter the divine ministry. Her voice in preaching Christ and him crucified would not only be in contradiction to divine commands, but offensiv to her maker. But as a corresponding privilege to the serpent's hiss the removed rib is permitted to laugh as a harmless expression of pleasurable emotion, as she must under all circumstances look cheerful in the presence of her master; and while the Christian clergy enjoin godly silence on the woman, nothing gratifies their vanity more than to hear the silly giggle ripple over the audience at some effort of wit from the sacred desk.

> "'Twas Rory O'More courted Kathleen Bawn;
> He poulticed a heart and she swallowed it down,"

says the parody. So the clergy, with the glutinous linseed of Moses, made slick and slab by the apostles, spread its slippery bulk before women, whose gullible minds gulp it down without a wince, at which the clergy become so inflated with their own importance as to almost meet with the fate of the frog in the fable.

The removed rib, not supposed to be endowed with reason, is made the fulcrum upon which the godly image rests his claim of opposition to her equality with him, while he, being endowed with reason, an attribute through which he is guided to the knowledge of all good, and thereby raised far above his help, was not designed by the creator to hold any relation of equality with her.

"An ideal of the moral law can only be conceived under an empire of reason." Man, therefore, being an image of God, and endowed with reason and possessing a soul, must be that ideal, and the removed rib, in the position of help, only an animal of instinct governed wholly by animal impulse or intuition.

"Humanity is the commonwealth of reason." If that be true, then the being formed of the removed rib, not being endowed with reason, as is generally supposed, and without the assurance of possessing a soul, can claim no relation to the moral law, or to any knowledge of it, nor to humanity, but can only rest her claim of human identity upon the first hypothesis—that of being a creature made merely to help the godly image. Therefore it is quite obvious why the creator placed her under the surveillance of his image. For, being made of condemned material, her imperfections would be apt to assert themselvs at any time; and, being void of reason, she could lay no claims to humanity nor to a knowledge of the moral law by a statement of its tenets, consequently she could not be remonstrated with for its violation. But being made subject to the godly image, who is a reasonable being, she can only be taught obedience to the law by the punishment inflicted on her by him for its violation, like other animals of instinct.

The imperfections of the removed bone seem not to hav seized upon the physical construction with the same deadly results as on the mental development. If it had, the consequences would hav been less dire.

Physically, the woman is peculiarly constructed. Possessing great vitality, wonderful endurance, and being exceedingly flexible, she is capable of bearing any amount of pummeling without an adequate force for a return blow. This seems to be a wise provision of the creator for the safety of his son when wishing to indulge his penchant to strike and nothing to hit; he can gratify that particular reflex of his creator—who is a god of war—on her with perfect safety to himself from bodily harm.

The power of the imperfections of the removed rib, in the form of woman, to harm the godly image, it would seem from all subsequent teaching, exists in her subtle cunning, distilled from its own defects, reservoired in the brain, and made visible through the conduits of results. But the godly image had passed the office of mother over to this removed rib, therefore she must exist as a necessity, but like a ferocious beast held in check, not by inclosures which would render her useless as a servant, but by religions and laws which would prove more powerful than the lion's cage, more straitened than the maniac's jacket, more secure than prison walls, and a priesthood to stand guard over her conduct like sentinels on watch-towers, or like little boys on the brink of a pond to pelt down every head that should dare to rise above its surface to blurt out, "Leather head!" Blocked at every turn, still the removed rib defies her maker and his image, and seizes on her office as help or servant as a pivot on which to successfully turn in feeling her way to power.

The godly image is exceedingly epicurean. How far he reflects the image of his creator in that particular the Bible does not say. But man will eat anything, from an oyster to an ox. In all Christian countries they congregate into eating clubs. In England they hav clubs for eating beefsteak. In the United States they form into clubs for eating turtles and other reptils, also clubs for eating clams. No politician is supposed to be able to make a good speech without first electrifying the brain by devouring a thousand or so of those heavyweights at a clambake. No godly image is supposed to be able to make a good speech who does not rest its merits on the corner-stone of a good dinner. The same quick eye that flashed in Eden has lost none of its shrewdness in discerning this weak point of her master—the possession of an insatiable maw that must be pampered and fed. In administering to his appetite, the removed rib cunningly disarms all suspicion by her innocent deportment, low whispers, and seductiv smiles.

Eve opened the influence of the feeding charm, and ruined a world. Rebecca robbed Esau of his birthright by feeding her husband on pottage. Leah's well-cooked mandrakes proved more powerful than Rachel's beauty, and through them she recaptured her husband. Esther made a feast for her husband that she might hav power over him. Cleopatra dazed Antony and purloined his reason by stimulating cups and delicate plates. Once let a woman tell a man she can feed him well, can get up good dinners, and it will so charm him that he will follow her about like a pet in leading-strings.

Seeing this new menace to his image from the removed rib, the creator threw around him the protection of his wise prototypes. Thus Solomon, the wisest of holy writ, warns the godly images with much earnestness against her repasts, because, says he, "her feet go down to death; her steps take hold on hell." All they know is to sit at their doors and call you in. Drink no wine! exclaims this wise man of the Bible to the godly images. Why? Because it will "steal away your brains." Nay, worse; because it will make you "swagger and swear and discourse fustian with one's own shadow." A still worse reason. Hear: "Because it will make your eyes see women." Beware of women and wine, again admonishes the wise man of the holy Bible to the godly images. Christian civilization has modernized this proverb to women and whisky. "Go not too near her," continues the wise prophet, "for a woman is like a jewel in the snout of a hog; and her mouth is as a deep pit" for the godly images to fall in. So we may continue to quote, for the Bible is full of admonitions and warnings to his earthly sons if sinners entice them to consent not. But we fail to find one caution to the daughters of men, as women are termed in the Bible, against the temptation of men.

The Christian ministry take up the Bible refrain and continue to warn the saints against her contaminating influence. In a discussion before the Presbyterian synod in Georgia, the Rev. Mr. Cleveland deemed the practice of dancing with a woman one of the most pernicious of amusements, and, like the divine Solomon, warned the saints against its seductiv charms. He said he knew how it was himself. He had danced stag dances at college, but they did not affect him like a dance with a woman.

The Rev. Mr. Cartlege, in the same discussion, also warned the saints with his experience, and said he was twenty years old the first time he danced with a woman. The effect on him was awful.

Said a clergyman to Chastine Cox, in his cell, a few weeks previous to his execution:

"My brother, what induced you to kill Mrs. Hull?"

"I don't know," stammered the culprit.

"Was it woman?"

"Yah, yah; 'twas woman."

"What word shall I take to my congregation from you?"

"Tell 'em beware of women," he quickly responded.

The godly images hav ever been in the utmost dread lest they should lose power over the removed rib in the form of woman. If she refuses to obey his commands he begins to tremble in his boots, laws are made more binding, and edicts go forth. The Bible tells us that King Ahasuerus was so alarmed at the disobedience of Vashti that he at once called together his wise men to advise with them what was best to do with women who dared to disobey their husbands. If an entire army had been battering at his gates, each soldier bearing a keg of dynamite, the king would not hav been more frightened. Nothing would seem to giv the godly images so grand a scare as to let the removed rib loose on him. In many countries women are kept closely confined, and the godly images wait on themselvs. In England, where they hav more scope, men are in the utmost danger. The Argyle of London was recently refused a license, because women were seen to go there, capture gentlemen, and carry them off.

In the city of New York representativs of the removed rib hav been arrested and imprisoned for being found on the street after dark, to the great insecurity of the godly image.

In the summer of 1878 a line of steamboats were forbid by the godly images to land at Yorkville, N. Y., if Adam's removed ribs were permitted to go ashore or on board at that place.

The godly image never admits the equality of the removed rib, and shames at the fact of being produced by a woman. Being born of a woman seemed to distress the patient Job more than all his boils. The pious Milton seemed to spurn the very thought of being born of a woman, and, in a streak of inspiration, exclaimed, with the utmost contempt, and indelibly fixed in black and white his dissatisfaction, as he asked,

> "Oh, why did God, creator wise, at last create this > Novelty on earth, this 'defect' of nature, and not
> Fill the earth at once with men as angels
> Without feminin, or find some other way to > Generate mankind?"

Jesus denied all relationship to such a being as mother. While he was in the hands of his enemies, word was given him that his mother was inquiring anxiously about him. Instead of sending to her mother's heart soothing words of consolation, he desired to know by a quick, blunt question who such a being could be that claimed the relationship of mother to him, and declared that he who did the will of his father was his mother. Throughout Christendom woman receives little or no consideration after she ceases to serve man. Thus the wife supersedes the mother, who is no longer supposed to serve her son, and is neglected and forgotten, while the mother-in-law is a mundane monstrosity with felin propensities, roaming about on a perpendicular, to destroy God's image. She is a target for every shot, a black mark on the pages of every newspaper, from the powerful metropolitan to the village penny-a-liner. No undue advantage is ever supposed to be taken of her defenseless position, for the Bible teaches that she must never giv back word or blow.

Little has been said by the prophets with regard to widows. St. Paul, however, picks up the cue and with one single shot fills the vacuum. The elder Weller is nothing to Paul. Hear him. Don't receive widows as co-equals in Christ under three score years old. The young widows do not receive at all, for they hav with them damnation. The Bible tells us of women being in league with the powers of darkness in the form of witchcraft. In Europe and the United States she has been executed for practicing her dark art. Russia has recently burnt one of those so-called old hags alive. Christian nations dare not teach the removed rib a knowledge of drugs lest she use the science to destroy godly images in embryo. Throughout the inspired word the figure of a woman is used to typify the vilest corruption and the most wicked atrocities, blood and carnage. Zachariah saw the damnation of a city typified form of a leaden woman pressed in an epha. The adjectiv "leaden" seems to be used by the seer to more fully intensify the symbol. John the revelator saw the abominations of a wicked city typified by a woman sitting on a scarlet beast full of names of blasphemy and filthiness. Milton declares that when sin was born it assumed the shape of a woman, which shape the Christian bard called execrable. Satan is placed in the masculin as a destroying power. But his potency is completely eclipsed in the feminin. A she-devil or a she anything is supposed to by far exceed the masculin in ferocity when aroused. Holy writ is very particular to state that the bears sent by the Lord to devour the forty children were she-bears. Jesus discovered a removed rib with seven devils in it. In the present period a godly image who can liv with a removed rib ten years and not become bald is congratulated on his good luck. The chief manager of the mission at New Britain declared that the women were the fiercest cannibals, and the most incorrigible to deal with, and that the feast on roasted missionaries recently at that mission was instigated by the women. Christian women outdo their heathen sisters in that direction. They devour that kind of food "raw," like oysters on the half-shell. Nothing seems to so take the courage out of a godly image as to find his removed rib his opponent. Dahomey, with one regiment of women, threw around himself the mantle of invincibility before which England's gunpowder and Gattling-guns came to a dead halt. Cetywayo lost all courage on seeing the daughter of a British officer shooting bottles from a fence. The Czar of Russia declared that the worst feature of Nihilism was that women were in it.

Notwithstanding the great precaution of her maker, and the instructions given to this image to hold the removed rib in check, man assures us that she is at the bottom of all ills. Shakspere declares she is the close contriver of all harms. Kingdoms hav annulled her accession to thrones. Republics dare not enfranchis her. It is alleged that the Castellar republic was destroyed through the influence of women. The godly images are in the utmost dread of women's rule. They assure us that their sway would be so despotic that men would take to their heels and flee to the woods to avoid her rule. The Lord God declared in so-called holy writ that he visited the children of Israel with plagues because the women made the men sin. The recent plague that visited Russia was said to hav been fetched there in a woman's shawl worn around the shoulders of a soldier whom it first killed. Lord Brawley declared in an after-dinner speech before his constituents that the women were the cause of the recent great depression in business the British nation was then laboring under.

The unmistakable fact of a defect existing in the removed rib of the godly image, and that it shows itself through the brain, is apparent in the precaution of her master not to expose her to immoral influences lest she take to vice, like fire to fuse, and social ruin inevitably follow. He must watch her movements, her going out and her coming in, and select all her reading matter. In view of these deplorable facts, she is forbidden to teach or preach.

The widow Van Cott was told by the bishop of the California conference that she must not preach, because she was a woman.

Father McGuire said before women could preach they must first dispose of their brains.

A clergymen in Jersey City lost his parish for permitting a woman to preach temperance from his pulpit.

A clergyman in Brooklyn came near losing his parish for permitting a woman to preach the word of God in his church.

Henry VIII. felt so degraded because one of his queens got the best of him in a biblical discussion that he ordered his executioners to be ready to take the head off a woman who should dare to teach her husband.

St. Paul, acting under alleged divine instruction, forbade women to teach.

The government of the United States felt greatly insulted because the wife of an Indian chief was taken by Sitting Bull into their councils with Gen. Terry, who drew back with contempt. The ridicule ran through the entire press of the country that Gen. Terry had been "squacked" at.

The wisest disposition of the removed rib as woman by the creator, in his perplexity, was to place her in the condition of property to the godly image. In the condition of chattel its defects, developed into turbulence, could be more readily subdued. The Bible assures us that man's wealth in those early ages consisted mainly in his women and cattle. In the Decalogue, the command not to covet the wife is classed with a man's stock. There is no command not to covet a husband, therefore it is quite evident no command was given to the woman any more than to the cattle. She is my goods, my chattels, my household stuff, my field, my barn, my horse, my ox, my ass; mine to command, mine to work, mine to punish, mine to hold in durance. Touch her who dares! says the great tragedian.

In all the wars of holy writ, young women or maiden captivs were commanded by the Lord to be divided up with other spoils between the priesthood and soldiers, while the older women were put to death.

The desire of the godly image to repossess himself of this removed bone is truly marvelous, and can only be viewed as a wise provision of the creator lest his image on earth, chafing under trying difficulties produced by her defects, should rise in his might and destroy her from the earth.

Evidently some great pecuniary profit must attach itself to her, from the fact that few godly images are satisfied with one. All God's special favorits of holy writ owned vast numbers of the removed rib. Stimulated by that holy example, the same custom still prevails throughout the orient, and to some extent here.

A gentleman in the Sandwich Islands wrote to his agent in New York for a cargo of the removed rib of the white cast. If a man loses one he seeks to replace her at once by one as near like the first as possible.

When P. T. Barnum sold his menagerie a few years since, a godly image was seen to bid largely on a tiger. Knowing him to be a private citizen, he was asked what he wished to do with this tiger. "Why," said the man, wiping his eyes, "I hav just lost my wife, and I thought of replacing her with this tiger."

A teamster in Nevada, having lost his wife, named his mule Nancy for her, the mule so forcibly reminded him of her; and, with tears in his eyes, he said the mule had kicked five hundred dollars' worth of harness to pieces, and she still continued to make the leather fly.

A shrew is supposed to be one of the most untamable of creatures. We never heard of but one being tamed. Men may command armies, govern mules, and tame tigers, but men to tame a shrew are as scarce as Cæsars, Alexanders, and Napoleons. The removed rib is supposed to be so treacherous in love that the godly image has found it necessary to exact from her an oath to honor and love under the penalty of divine displeasure.

In justice to himself the godly image mercifully instituted the law of monogamy, feeling that one wife was fully as much as any earthly son of God could well manage. So well has the institution worked to better his condition that to own but one removed rib at a time has become a fixed law throughout Christendom. It is a peculiar fact that we hav no authority for supposing woman partook of the atonement. During Jesus's stay on earth he was associated with women, but only as waiters to minister to his wants. He never ate with them. At the miraculous feast of loaves and fishes Jesus said, "Tell the men to sit down." Who doubts that women were there, and in all probability picked up the fragments and carried the baskets. At the last supper men only sat the table. Nor hav we any assurance of there being any women in heaven or that any women ever go to heaven. If we are to believe holy writ, heaven is one vast male club house. God is masculin, the son is masculin, angels are masculin, and, according to the alleged paternity of Jesus, the Holy Ghost is masculin. Nor hav we any assurance that the mother of Jesus went to heaven. We are told that we shall see in heaven Moses and the prophets, Christ and the apostles; Abraham but no Sarah, Isaac but no Rebecca, Jacob but no Rachel, the Lamb but no Mary. Milton says there was a woman in heaven. She was born there on the brain of Satan, but was with him thrown over heaven's battlements, and made gate-keeper of hell. When heaven was revealed to John he saw only men there, clothed in white, with crowns on their heads, praising God. Finally he says he did see one woman in heaven, which was a great wonder, but she did not stay there long. Listen to the sequel: The woman bore a male child, which was caught up to God. The woman then fled from heaven to a place prepared for her in the wilderness. If the child had been a girl it would hav fled with its mother. The revelator then saw several thousand men with the name of their father written in their foreheads. They were singing a new song. They were the first redeemed among men because they never had been defiled by women. Another woman was revealed to John, but not in heaven. She typified the blackest of crimes. She was drunken with the blood of the saints and the martyrs of Jesus. This is the unkindest cut of all. The vision of the revelator corroborates St. Paul, who says it was the women who urged him to persecute the saints.

St. Paul declares that nothing effeminate shall enter heaven. Effeminacy, by the learned apostle, is classed with the vilest crimes. All through the Bible, from Genesis to Revelations, the male is God's specialty, and no doubt meant by the creator to generate himself. Although foiled in his designs by a flaw in the framework of his own image, he is still the divine consideration on earth. He is the ruler, legislator, lawgiver, master, citizen, people; prowess his prerogativ, liberty his watchword, ever ready to strike down the foe that holds him. With a boundless domain he may go everywhere or anywhere, say everything or anything, ever ready for a fight, carouses at home and abroad, and sleeps with his back to his young. From the same divine word we learn that the removed rib from the framework of man of which woman was made is the source of all evil, the negativ of all good. All religions and all laws bind her with no higher rights than to cringe, bow, and serve in silence. All legislation in the most advanced nations with regard to her liberty seem stereotyped. All governments hav special enactments binding more rigorously this supposed cunning, erratic, incorigible creature, as if her freedom to act would destroy an empire, her liberty of expression demoralize a republic, her polemic presumption hellorize a world. She is the pariah of the human family, the producer of her own master, the express-wagon for conveying God's image from his creator to the cradle.

If equality had been the design of the Bible narrators it would be more logical to suppose that they would hav stated that the creator with one single blow with a broad-ax split Adam in two equal halves, closed the flesh thereof, and two equal beings would hav been the result. The Bible account of the origin of woman menaces her liberty at every turn. It hangs to her like a coffined corpse, beneath whose moldy lids a lifeless finger points to the Pentateuch and apostles admonishing her that every effort made by women for freedom is lost in the dying words of Wilkes Booth when his right arm dropped in death at his side, Useless, useless!

How any woman can engage in sending such an enemy to herself to peoples ignorant of such a work is beyond my conception. If the facts I hav stated be not true, then is woman greatly belied, the Bible a maligner, and the priesthood wretchedly deceived or consummate knaves.

Baptism.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Many years ago one said to Parker Pillsbury, "If you Abolitionists will let the church alone and cease the teaching of Infidelity, we can go with you; but if you persist in taking with Abolitionism the odium of Infidelity, we cannot." Parker replied, "If you cannot be baptized with the baptism that we are baptized with, you cannot go with us."

Although Liberals and reformers of every class may hav no written creed and acknowledge no obligation to submit to any ceremonial, they cannot escape baptism. I do not refer to the sham baptism that admits to a sham supper where baker's bread and grocer's wine is "make believe" the body and blood of Jesus Christ, but the real baptism, of which the church ceremonial of sprinkling, pouring, and immersion is a faint type and acknowledgment. We know, as an instance, that E. H. Heywood has been baptized into the church of reformers. Those who know the purity of his personal character wonder that such a baptism as he received should be required. The venerable Elder Evans, of the Shakers, says, "When you hav read and studied the writings of Thomas Paine as much as you hav the writings of Peter and of Paul, you will think as highly of him as you now do of Peter and of Paul." Yet Thomas Paine, his grave, and even his monument, were found worthy of baptism.

If any one thinks to join the Liberal church and be acknowledged as a member without baptism he will be disappointed. If Robert G. Ingersoll flinches when the rite is only commenced or half administered, or before the final amen, he cannot be admitted, much less become a leader. The priests of bigotry and intolerance stand with their fingers in the bowl and waist-deep in the font of filth ready to baptize all who are truly converted to the use of their reason, or follow the dictates of common sense; and according to the hight of love for truth and humanity will be the depth and blackness of the baptism. Yours truly, Nelson Brown.

The contents of the North American Review for March must win the attention of all by the timeliness of the topics discussed. First, we hav a thoughtful and moderate article by Bishop Coxe on "Theology in the Public Schools." The author would sternly exclude from the school-room all sectarian dogmas, whether Papist or Protestant, but he insists on the retention of the Bible, first, because that book is the principal fountain of our English speech, and secondly because it is really the base of our social system. The second article is by Captain Eads, who endeavors to show the practicability of his ship-railway, its advantages over all canal schemes, and why the United States can without risk guarantee the payment of 6 per cent interest on $50,000,000 of the capital stock of the proposed company. Judge H. H. Chalmers, writing of the effects of Negro Suffrage, bespeaks for the Southern States, while engaged with the solution of the great problem that has been forced upon them, the sympathy and counsel of the North. The other articles are "The Free-School System," by John D. Philbrick, being a reply to the recent strictures of Mr. Richard Grant White on the public schools; "Theological Charlatanism," by Mr. John Fiske, whose typical theological charlatan is Mr. Joseph Cook; and finally, a review of some recent publications in Physics, by Prof. A. W. Wright.

Dear Friends: I hav arranged with Mr. Bennett so as to keep and sell the "Darwins" myself, and I ask all who would like a simple story embodying our principles to try the book, and thus help me to help our glorious cause of universal mental liberty and social freedom. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Also, John's Way, 15 cents, and specimen numbers of our Physiologist, 10 cents.

What Objections to Christianity?

By reference to the elaborate writings of Sir William Jones, Dr. Martin Haug, Horace Hayman Wilson, Anquetil Duperron, Burnouf, Bopp, Spiegel, J. Cockburn Thomson, Samuel Beal, James Legge, D.D., J. Muir, LL.D., also Viscount Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief," Sir Godfrey Higgins's "Anacalypsis," Dr. Thomas Inman's "Ancient Faiths," Lydia Maria Child's "Progress of Religious Ideas," Samuel Johnson's "Oriental Religions," Jas. Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions," and similar works by other authors, it will be found, as before observed, that the belief in gods begetting sons upon females of the human race, of the virgin and child, was not only held by many ancient nations centuries before Christianity was known, but also of demi-gods being crucified and otherwise put to death for the sins of mankind; of a doctrine of the trinity, immortality, angels and devils, heaven and hell, the eucharist, baptism, and miracles, and, in short, without particularizing, every dogma, rite, and ceremony held and observed by the Christian church to-day. This reply has already reached a much greater length than I intended, and I conceive it hardly worth while to introduce quotations here to prove this position. If you think there is any dogma or dogmas of the Christian church that were not believed and taught by the ancient pagans, I ask you to point them out, that we may see whether it cannot be shown that the ancients held to something very similar long before Christianity existed as a system. If there is one dogma of the Christian church that is held to-day that was not practiced by the ancient pagans, it is that of auricular confession, which was devised but a few centuries ago; but as that is enjoined by the Catholic half of the Christian church, you will not, of course, insist that it is a part of real Christianity; so really, so far as you are concerned, there is no exception to make.

You object to some of the authors I have named to prove that Christianity is merely revamped paganism, a new formulation of the doctrines that had previously existed; but you will hardly refuse to accept the testimony of the early Fathers of the church. Let us see for a moment what some of them had to say upon the matter under consideration:

1. Justin Martyr was born in the latter part of the first century and died in the year 165. In his "Apology," addressed to Antoninus Pius, he said: "If, then, we hold some opinions near akin to those of the poets and philosophers in most repute among you, why are we thus unjustly hated? When we teach a general conflagration, what do we teach more than the Stoics? By opposing the work of men's hands we concur with Meander, the commedian; and by declaring the Logos—the first begotten of God, our master, Jesus Christ—to be born of a virgin, without any human mixture, to be crucified and dead, and to hav arisen again and ascended into heaven, we say no more in this than what you say of the sons of Jove; for you need not be told what number of sons the writers most in vogue among you assign to Jove. There is Mercury, Jove's interpreter, in imitation of the Logos, in worship among you. There is Æsculapius, the physician, smitten by a thunderbolt, and after that ascending into heaven. There is Bacchus torn to pieces, and Hercules burned to get rid of his pains. There are Castor and Pollux, the sons of Jove by Leda, and Perseus by Dinæ. Not to mention others, I fain would know why you always deify departed emperors, and have a fellow at hand to make affidavit that Cæsar ascended into heaven from the funeral pile. As to the son of God called Jesus, should we allow him to be no more than man, yet the title of 'Son of God' is very justifiable on account of his wisdom, considering you have your Mercury in worship under the title of 'Word' and 'Messenger of God.' As to the objection of our Jesus being crucified, I say that suffering was common to all the aforementioned sons of Jove, but only they suffered another kind of death. As to his being born of a virgin, you have your Perseus to balance that. As to his curing the lame, the paralytic, and such as were crippled from their birth, this is little more than what you say of your Æsculapius."

The same Christian Father, in another place, says: "It having reached the devil's ears that the prophets had foretold that Christ would come for the purpose of tormenting the wicked in fire, set the heathen poets to bring forward a great many who should be called the sons of Jove, the devil, laying his scheme in this, to get men to imagine that the true history of Christ was of the same character as those prodigious fables."

2. Tertullian, another eminent Christian Father of the second century, thus admits that the doctrines of Christianity were to be found in heathen writings: "The heathens, from a design of curiosity, put our doctrines into their works" (Cap. 46, 47).

3. Melito, one of the first bishops of the church, in an apology to Marcus Antoninus, says: "Pious men are now persecuted and harrassed throughout Asia, which was never done before; and impudent sycophants and such as covet the possessions of others, taking occasion from the edicts, rob without fear of shame and cease not to plunder those who have offended in nothing. . . . . For the philosophy which we profess truly flourished aforetime, but having blossomed again in the reign of Cæsar Augustus, thy ancestor, it proved to be above all things ominous of good for thy kingdom. . . . . Retain, therefore, this religion which grew as your empire grew, which began with Augustus, which was reverenced by your ancestors before all religion" (Euseb. Eccl. Hist., book iv, cap. xxvi).

4. Origen, one of the greatest Christian authorities of the first three centuries, in reply to Celsus, who had alleged that the worship among Christians was common among the pagans, thus explained the matter: "To this I answer that since I have granted that some notions of good and evil are originally planted in the minds of men, we need not wonder that Heraclitus and others, whether Greeks or barbarians, have acknowledged to the world that they held the very same notions that we mention" (Book v).

To further account for the awkwardness of heathens and Christians holding to the same doctrines, in another place he says: "God revealed those things to them [the heathens] and whatsoever they have well spoken" (Book vi). Of course Origen knew just about as much as to what God revealed to the Hindoos, Persians, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans, as we of this day know. They obtained their religious notions by invention and borrowing, precisely as Christians came by theirs.

5. Ammonius Saccus, another of the renowned primitive church Fathers, gives his testimony as to the common origin of religious opinions in this language: "All the Gentile religions, and even the Christian religion, are to be illustrated and explained by the principles of universal philosophy; but that in order to do this the fables of the priests are to be removed from paganism, and the interpretations of priests from Christianity" (Mosheim's Eccl. Hist., vol. i, p. 174).

6. St. Clement, of Alexandria, born at Athens in the year 200, was a popular early Christian writer. In his first book, "Protreticus," he exhorts pagans to embrace Christianity. In his second book, "Paidagogos," he explains Christian morals; while in the third, "Stromata," he instructs upon general subjects. In the last volume he says: "One article of faith is that Christ is the first begotten of God, and we have proved him to be the very Logos or universal reason by which mankind were all partakers; therefore those who live by reason are in some sort Christians, notwithstanding they may have passed with you for Atheists; such as among the Greeks were Socrates, Heraclitus, and the like; such among the barbarians were Abraham, Ananas, Mizeal, and Elias." In the same volume he again says: "All virtuous thoughts are imparted by divine inspiration, and that cannot be of evil origin which tends to promote good, therefore the Greek philosophy is good. But God is the author of all good, and therefore the Greek philosophy is from God. It follows that the law was given to the Jews and philosophy to the Greeks until the advent of our Lord" (6 Strom. 17).

In another place he ventilates his theory of the divine origin of pagan teachings thus: "This philosophy the pagans received from the fertilizing influence of the divine Logos, which descended at the same time on the Jews, giving them the law and the prophets; and upon the Gentiles, giving them philosophy, like rain which falls upon the housetop as well as on the fields." Again, he argues by interrogations: "Doth not Plato mention both the rivers of fire and that profound depth of the earth which the Jews call Gehenna? Does he not prophetically mention Tartarus, Cocytus, Acheron, Phlegethon, rivers of fire, and certain other like places of punishment which led to correction and discipline?"

7. Eusebius, the great Christian writer and authority of the fourth century, while he admitted that Christianity revealed nothing new to mankind, endeavored to explain the damaging fact away by the miserable hypothesis that the devil stole the Christian doctrines and gave them to the pagan poets and philosophers. In his Ecclesiastical History, book i, chap iv, entitled "The Religion Announced by Christ Nothing New or Strange," he asserts that every pious person, from Abraham to the first of the human race, was a Christian, and hence says, "The religion delivered to us in the doctrines of Christ is not a new or strange doctrine." In book ii, chapter xvii, pp. 66-70, the same Christian Father gives Philo's description of the Therapeuts, before the name of Christianity was known and long before the period when Christ is said to have been born, who had churches, sacred scriptures, gospels, and epistles, probably the same as those in the New Testament, observed the festival of the Savior's passion, the vigil of the great festival, the exercises, hymns, and practices observed by the church in his day. He also quotes from Aurelius, a pagan author who wrote in the year 163, the following: "And this Mercury was plainly the Word by whom all things were made, as Heraclitus also would say, and by Jove, the same whom the barbarians affirm to have been in the place and dignity of a principle, and to be with God, and to be God, by whom all things were made and in whom everything that is made has its life and being, who descended into a body, and by putting on flesh took the appearance of man, though even then he gave proofs of the majesty of his nature, nay, and after his dissolution was deified again" (Euseb. proeb. Evan. lib. xi, c. 19. See Lardner, vol. iv, p. 200).

8. Constantine the Great, the warrior who bestowed power upon the church, used much the same arguments, and insisted that "the Erythæan Sibyl, who lived in the sixth age after the flood, did yet by the power of divine inspiration prophesy of future matters that were to come to pass concerning God, by the first letters of six lines of a poem, which acrostically make Jesus Christus Dei Filius Salvator, Crux. And these things came in the virgin's mind by way of prophecy" (Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. ii, p. 269).

9. Annobius, the elder, a prominent Christian teacher, early in the fourth century, wrote seven books of "Disputationes Adversus Gentes," in which he indorses the general sentiment of Eusebius and other Fathers, and says, "If Cicero's works had been read as they ought to have been, there would have been no need of Christian writers."

10. Lactantius, another teacher who lived about the same time, says, "If there had been any [among pagans] to collect the truth which was scattered among sects and individuals into one, and to have reduced it into a system, there would indeed have been no difference between him and us" (Book ii).

11. St. Augustine, perhaps the greatest of all the early Christian authorities, says: "In our time is the Christian religion, which to know and follow is the most sure and certain health, called according to that name, but not according to the thing of which it is the name; for the thing itself, the same which is now called the Christian religion, really was known to the ancients, nor was wanting at any time, even from the beginning of the human race until the time Christ came in the flesh, from whence the true religion, not as having been wanting in former times, but having in later times received a new name" (Oper. Aust., vol. i, p. 12).

12. Faustus, a distinguished bishop, in addressing St. Augustine, says: "You have substituted your Agapæ for the sacrifices of the pagans, and for their idols your martyrs, that you serve with the very same honors; you appease the shades of the dead with wine and feasts; you celebrate the solemn festivals of the Gentiles, their calends and their solstices; and as to their manners, those you have retained without any alteration. Nothing distinguishes you from the Gentiles except that you assemble apart from them."

13. Abulmerar, another authority, says: "We have in the first decade the sign of the Virgin, following the most ancient tradition of the Persians, the Chaldeans, the Egyptians, Hermes, and Æsculapius, a young woman, called in the Persian language Seclini dos de Darzama; in the Arabic, Adrenedfa; that is to say, a chaste, pure, immaculate virgin, suckling an infant, which some nations call Jesus, but which we in Greek call Christ."

From the foregoing authorities the leading fact stands boldly out that not only is Christianity made up of the dogmas, rites, and practices of preëxisting religions, but that the leading Christian Fathers well understood it. To the unprejudiced truth seeker the conviction is that there is nothing absolutely new in the Christian religion, and that all, all, was made up of the fables, myths, and religious conceptions of the nations who had existed hundreds, if not thousands, of years earlier. From this conclusion there is no escape.

THE ESSENES.

Apart from the possible source whence Christianity might have been derived, the great reality of its existence is a fixed fact. That it did have an origin cannot for a moment be disputed. Of all the possible sources of Christianity, that of the Essenes presents the one most probable. We learn from Josephus, as well as from Philo, that for about two centuries before our era the Jews were divided into three principal sects—Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. The last were probably the least numerous, but amounted to four or five thousand in Judea. They were a very religious people, who spent their time in doing good, living lives of self-denial, asceticism, abstemiousness, and a partial separation from the world. They practiced celibacy, and held their property in common, being a united and devoted brotherhood. Their membership could only be kept up from persons joining them from the outside world, as all intercourse with women was strictly prohibited. They were a most industrious people, giving their attention to agriculture and the raising of flocks. They despised riches; and neither poverty nor wealth was known among them. When persons joined them they were compelled to contribute all they had to the common fund. Every one in the receipt of wages or money for any cause was expected to hand the same over to the custodian, whose business it was to provide for the wants of the community. They rejected pleasure of all kinds as sinful, and lived remarkably devoted and virtuous lives.

They dressed coarsely, and preferred white to other colors. Their daily lives were governed by the strictest rules. Before the rising of the sun they were to speak of nothing profane, but offered to the sun certain traditional forms of prayer as if beseeching it to rise. After the morning service they engaged in their daily toil, working steadily till the fifth hour, when they assembled, and, girding on a garment of linen for the purpose, bathed in cold water. They next seated themselves quietly in the dining-hall, where bread was set before them by the baker, and the cook brought each one a dish of simple vegetable food. They made little or no use of animal food. Grace was said by the priest before each meal. The dinner over, they returned to their labor, which they diligently pursued till the setting of the sun, when all joined in a simple evening meal. They made little or no noise to mar the tranquillity. No one assumed an undue share of conversation. Their quiet manner of life almost oppressed a stranger with a feeling of mysterious awe. They rendered the strictest obedience to the instructions of their officers and priests. In two ways only were the common members permitted to act without authority. These were helpfulness and mercy. The deserving poor and destitute were to receive immediate relief in all cases. Their benevolence was almost unbounded; but no member could give anything to a relative without the permission of the heads of the society.

The officers were selected by the members. Their courts of justice were composed of not less than one hundred members, and their decisions were arrived at with extreme caution, and they were irreversible and without appeal. Ordinary oaths were not permitted among them, but their word was stronger and more sacred than an oath.

Their rules required a novitiate of three years, during which time the intending member was thoroughly tested as to his fitness for entering the society. If admitted, the candidate was required to make fearful oaths that he would reverence the deity, do justice to all men, hurt no man voluntarily or at the instance of another, oppose the unjust, assist the just, render fidelity to all men, particularly to the officers of the society. He pledged himself to oppose theft, lying, and dishonesty. The Essenes were skilful in the treatment of diseases, and applied themselves assiduously in learning the medical qualities of plants that grew in their country.

The sick and aged were objects of especial care and kindness. They condemned slavery, and are believed to have been among the first people of the world who were strongly opposed to it. Their sacred books were carefully preserved, and read with the greatest reverence. They rejected animal sacrifice. They opposed anointing with oil. They maintained a devout reverence for the sun. They were not allowed to insult its rays by any unclean act. They held that the body is mortal and its substance transitory; that the soul is immortal, but, coming from the subtlest ether, is lured as by a sorcery of nature into the prison house of the body. At death it is relieved from its bonds as from long slavery, and joyously soars aloft. They believed that the faithful and virtuous after death went to a heaven of happiness and bliss, while the wicked were forced to a region of darkness and misery. For the full description by Josephus of this remarkable people see his "Wars," book ii, chapter viii, and his "Antiquities of the Jews," book xiii.

With regard to the doctrines of the soul and a future life, their belief bore a strong resemblance to the doctrines of Zoroaster, Pythagoras, and Plato, which had an early home in India, Burmah, Persia, Egypt, and the land of the Druids. That the Essenes of Judea were not the first to inculcate the doctrines of the soul and a future life is well known. That these views were drawn from people or nations which had previously held them is only a reasonable conclusion. It has been thought, and with considerable propriety, that their immediate origin was the Therapeuts of Egypt, a very similar people, a sect of ascetic, religious healers. This view was acquiesced in by several early writers, and Eusebius adopted the same.

It is not strange that such Christian writers as Thomas de Quincey, when discovering that a prior existence of such a people as the Essenes militated against the claims of Christianity, and thoroughly accounted for its origin, should denounce Josephus's account of the Essenes as false. De Quincey did this, and went so far as to say, "If there is a syllable of truth in the main statement of Josephus, then at one blow goes to wreck the whole edifice of Christianity." He further said if there were such a people as the Essenes which Josephus describes, "then there were Christians without Christ; there was Christianity invented by man." He was fully imbued with the idea that unless the statements of Josephus could be denied and set aside the whole fabric of Christianity fell to the ground. He accused Josephus, in the account he wrote of that early people, of erasing the name of Christians and inserting the name Essenes instead.

The denunciations of De Quincey against the account of Josephus did not avail to destroy his testimony. The latter lived at the very time when the Essenes were still in existence, and knew far more of them than De Quincey had the power to judge. And the statements of Josephus are thoroughly sustained by other unimpeachable authorities, notably Philo Judæus and Pliny. Philo was born some fifty years before Josephus, in the year 20 before the Christian era, and Josephus in the year 37 after. Philo was a learned, conscientious, and highly cultivated man, and what he says can be taken in full confidence. In his essay "On the Virtuous being also the Free" (vol. iii of his works, p. 523. Bohn's edition), he gives a full description of the Essenes, of the pure, abstemious, and virtuous lives they led, and his account sustains what Josephus said at a somewhat later date. In his "Fragments" (vol. iv, p. 219) in an essay "On a Contemplative Life," he gives a further account of this peaceful, self-denying, virtuous people, including their form of worship by reading their sacred scriptures and singing hymns, all of which I would gladly quote did time and space justify.

The elder Pliny, in his "Natural History," thus describes them: "On the western shore of that lake [the Dead Sea] dwell the Essenes, at a sufficient distance from the water's edge to escape its pestilential exhalations—a race entirely unique and beyond every other in the world, deserving of wonder; men living among palm trees, without wives, without money. Every day their number is replenished by a new troop of settlers, for those join them who have been visited by the reverses of fortune, who are tired of the world and its style of living. Thus happens what might seem incredible, that a community in which no one is born continues to subsist through the lapse of centuries."

As Pliny died in the year 79 of our era, it was impossible for him to hav written about the Christians having existed for centuries. He was unmistakably writing of the Essenes, from whom the Christians probably descended. Thus, however damaging it is to the claims of Christianity that such a virtuous, self-denying people as the Essenes were described to be on all hands—a people who possessed all the virtues claimed by Christians—De Quincey must be compelled to admit that the Essenes had a real, bona fide existence, though that fact throws the claims of Christianity to the ground.

It is not difficult to trace the similarity between Essenism and Christianity, and to understand that the sacred writings and beliefs of the one become the scriptures and creed of the other. Thus:

1. The Essenes were Communists and held all their property and goods in common. This characteristic of theirs was later adopted by Christians. See Luke, x, 4; John xii, 6; xiii, 29; Matt. xix, 21; Acts ii, 44, 45; iv, 32, 34, 37.

2. In dress they were simple; protection from the weather and covering their nakedness being all that was deemed necessary. Compare Matt. vi, 28, 34; Luke xii, 22, 30.

3. The taking of oaths was strictly condemned, their answers being simply, "Yea, yea; nay, nay." See Matt. v, 34.

4. In diet they were extremely abstemious and rigidly restrained themselves from luxury, gluttony, and an unbridled appetite. See Matt. vi, 25, 31; Luke xii, 22, 23; Matt. xv, 15–20.

5. A perfect and willing obedience to the constituted authorities was strictly enjoined. It was the same with the disciples of Jesus; they were required to render obedience to the authorities to obey their rulers and to render to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's.

6. Fasting and secret prayer were required of the Essenes. See Matt. vi, 1–18.

7. Their works of philanthropy and deeds of humanity were in marked contrast with the narrow prejudices of the other Jewish sects. See Luke x, 25–37; Mark vii, 26.

8. Their great veneration for light was much the same as Christianity later inculcated. See Matt. iv, 16; v, 14, 16; vi, 22; Luke ii, 32; viii, 16; xi, 23; xvi, 8; John i, 4–9; iii, 19, 21; viii, 12; ix, 5; xi, 9, 10; xii, 35, 46.

9. The Essenes had secret doctrines which were taught only to the initiated, while for the common classes and uninitiated the doctrines were embodied in symbols and allegories. See Matt. xiii, 11, 15; Mark iv, 12; Luke, viii, 10.

10. The Essenes were enjoined to love each other and to be kind and faithful. It was the same with the Christians at a later date. These resemblances between Essenism and Christianity could be carried to a much greater extent, but the above are probably sufficient for present purposes. Further along in our discussion I will endeavor to show that the canonical gospels and epistles were probably obtained from the Essenes and Therapeuts.

I will not longer dwell upon the subject of the Essenes in this connection, but will recur to it if you call the subject up. Enough has been said to show that that very religious, spiritual-minded sect had an existence two centuries before Christianity or its reputed founder was known in the world, and that the existence of the former was a good and sufficient reason for the existence of the latter. The Jewish people of that period were in an active state of religious thought; religious sects abounded among them, and it was perfectly easy, with some modifications and corruptions, for Christianity to be the outgrowth and successor of the sect of Essenes. It is no more than has occurred in the world hundreds of times before and since. And it must be admitted that so long as a good and sufficient natural cause and source can be found for any reality that has existed, it is perfectly futile and irrational to assign a supernatural cause, a divine origin for it. It is perfectly easy to see that Essenism was the natural outgrowth of the systems of religious belief which existed before it, and Christianity was but the natural outgrowth of Essenism, with the various conceptions and traditions from other sources which were easy and natural for an imitative and superstitious people to adopt.

At the advent of Christianity Rome was the political mistress of the world, but the seed which had been sown broadcast through the influence of the immortal school of Alexandria had resulted in the disintegration of the Grecian and Roman mythology as well as the Jewish theocracy. The religious world of Rome was in complete anarchy, and the multiplication of sects was very similar to what has repeatedly taken place sixteen or eighteen hundred years later. Paganism was corrupt and dead. The great Cicero said priests dared not look each other in the face on festival days lest they should betray the hollow mockery of their ceremonies. Phariseeism had degenerated into hypocritical formalism, and Sadduceeism was the faith of the intellectual few, having little place in the collective human soul. The Jews as a nation had been subjugated, but the religious genius of that wonderful people produced in the sect of the Essenes the germs of a religious faith and a spiritual power under whose influence the mighty military empire of Rome was crumbled and overthrown.

It is quite possible that the conditions consequent upon the failure of the old faith rendered it impracticable for the Essenes to longer maintain their sect as a secret organization. Containing the elements of a religious faith, though taken from preëxisting religions, it perhaps contained the elements of a religious creed better adapted to meet the requirements of the time and age than what else was then in existence, it burst its narrow bounds, and through the influence of such zealous teachers as St. Paul was founded as the religion destined to triumph over other systems and perhaps ultimately to subdue the principal nations of the earth. All this, or all of it that has been accomplished, has been the result of natural causes, and the work of human beings. There is nothing connected with it all that can be truthfully claimed as requiring supernatural forces, nothing beyond the reach of ordinary powers and possibilities.

Gibbon adduced five causes for the growth of the Christian religion: 1. The inflexible and intolerant zeal of the devotees of the system, though derived from the Jewish religion, yet freed from the narrow unsocial spirit, which, instead of inviting had deterred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses; 2. The doctrine of a future life, which had been borrowed from older systems; 3. The miraculous powers ascribed to the new religion; 4. The pure and austere morals of the Christians, which they had taken from the Essenes; 5. The union and discipline of the Christian republic, which gradually formed an independent and increasing state in the heart of the Roman empire. To these have been added, 6. The want of a better religion then beginning to be widely felt in the Greek and Roman world. These were outgrowing their crude polytheism, and began to look upon their "elegant mythology" with evident disgust.

Not to repeat what I have before said, I will remark that every event which has taken place in the world has been the result of a natural cause or causes, and that such a thing as a supernatural cause has never existed. Thus the growth of Christianity has not been the result of a supernatural cause, but it has been wholly in keeping with natural causes and conditions. Christianity has not grown so rapidly nor spread so widely as have other religions, notably Buddhism and Mohammedanism, which like it were natural results, and were spread wholly by natural means.

After some appropriate remarks upon the nature of "miracles," which is the subject of our next thesis, I will bring this prolonged reply to a close, begging pardon for the space occupied in my extended remarks, urging the importance of the subject and the extent of ground to be covered as my apology.

Col. Ingersoll Talks about his Threatened Indictment in Delaware for Blasphemy.

[The following report of an interview of a special correspondent with Col. Ingersoll is from the Brooklyn Eagle, and as it is fuller than the report from the Express, given two weeks ago, and contains many good hits which that did not, the reader will doubtless be interested in it.]

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, genial and obliging, was at his pleasant home to-night, and talked freely of matters in general; but I managed to pin him down to the state of Delaware in particular, with the question:

"I understand, Colonel, that you hav been indicted in the state of Delaware for the crime of blasphemy?"

"Well, not exactly indicted. The judge, who, I believe, is chief justice of the state, dedicated the new court-house at Wilmington to the services of the Lord by a charge to the grand jury, in which he almost commanded them to bring in a bill of indictment against me for what he was pleased to call the crime of blasphemy. Now, as a matter of fact, there can be no crime committed by man against God, provided always that a correct definition of the deity has been given by the orthodox churches. They say that he is infinit. If so, he is conditionless. I can injure a man by changing his conditions. Take from a man water, and he perishes of thirst; take from him air, and he suffocates; he may die from too much or too little heat. That is because he is a conditioned being. But if God is conditionless, he cannot in any way be affected by what anybody else may do, and consequently a sin against God is as impossible as a sin against the principle of the lever or inclined plane. This crime called blasphemy was invented by priests for the purpose of defending doctrins not able to take care of themselvs. Blasphemy is a kind of breastwork behind which hypocrisy has crouched for thousands of years. Injustice is the only blasphemy that can be committed, and justice is the only true worship. Man can sin against man, but not against God. But even if man could sin against God, it has always struck me that an infinit being would be entirely able to take care of himself without the assistance of a chief justice. Men hav always been violating the rights of men under the plea of defending the rights of God; and nothing for ages was so perfectly delightful to the average Christian as to gratify his revenge and get God in his debt at the same time. Chief Justice Comegys has taken this occasion to lay up for himself what he calls treasures in heaven, and on the last great day he will probably rely on a certified copy of this charge. The fact that he thinks the Lord needs help satisfies me that in that particular neighborhood I am a little ahead. The fact is, I never delivered but one lecture in Delaware. That lecture, however, had been preceded by a Republican stump speech; and, to tell you the truth, I imagin that the stump speech is what a Yankee would call the heft of the offense. It is really hard for me to tell whether I hav blasphemed the deity or the Democracy. Of course, I hav no personal feeling whatever against the judge. In fact, he has done me a favor. He has called the attention of the civilized world to certain barbarian laws that disfigure and disgrace the statute books of most of the states. These laws were passed when our honest ancestors were burning witches, trading Quaker children to the Barbadoes for rum and molasses, branding people upon the forehead, boring their tongues with hot irons, putting one another in the pillory, and, generally in the name of God, making their neighbors as uncomfortable as possible. We hav outgrown these laws without repealing them. They are, as a matter of fact, in most communities actually dead; but in some of the states, like Delaware, I suppose they could be enforced, though there might be trouble in selecting twelve men, even in Delaware, without getting one man broad enough, sensible enough, and honest enough, to do justice. I hardly think it would be possible in any state to select a jury in the ordinary way that would convict any person charged with what is commonly known as blasphemy.

"All the so-called Christian churches hav accused each other of being blasphemers in turn. The Catholics denounced the Presbyterians as blasphemers, the Presbyterians denounced the Baptists, the Baptists the Presbyterians, and the Catholics all united in denouncing the Quakers, and they altogether denounced the Unitarians, called them blasphemers because they did not acknowledge the divinity of Jesus Christ, the Unitarians only insisting that three infinit beings were not necessary, that one infinit being could do all the business, and that the other two were absolutely useless. This was called blasphemy. Then all the churches united to call the Universalists blasphemers. I can remember when a Universalist was regarded with a thousand times more horror than an Infidel is to-day. There is this strange thing about the history of theology—nobody has ever been charged with blasphemy who thought God bad. For instance, it never would hav excited any theological hatred if a man had insisted that God would finally damn everybody. Nearly all heresy has consisted in making God better than the majority in the churches thought him to be. The orthodox Christians never will forgiv the Universalists for saying that God is too good to damn anybody eternally. Now, all these sects hav charged each other with blasphemy without any one of them knowing really what blasphemy is. I suppose they hav occasionally been honest, because they hav mostly been ignorant. It is said that Torquemada used to shed tears over the agonies of his victims, and that he recommended slow burning, not because he wished to inflict pain, but because he really desired to giv the gentleman or lady he was burning a chance to repent of his or her sins and make his or her peace with God previous to becoming a cinder.

"The root, foundation, germ, and cause of nearly all religious persecution is the idea that some certain belief is necessary to salvation. If orthodox Christians are right in this idea, then persecution of all heretics and Infidels is a duty. If I hav the right to defend my body from attack, surely I should hav a like right to defend my soul. Under our laws I could kill any man who was endeavoring, for example, to take the life of my child. How much more would I be justified in killing any wretch who was endeavoring to convince my child of the truth of a doctrin which, if believed, would result in the eternal damnation of that child's soul? If the Christian religion, as it is commonly understood, is true, no Infidel should be allowed to liv; every heretic should be hunted from the wide world as you would hunt a wild beast. They should not be allowed to speak; they should not be allowed to poison the minds of women and children; in other words, they should not be allowed to empty heaven and fill hell. The reason I hav liberty in this country is because the Christians of this country do not believe their doctrins. The passage from the Bible, 'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature,' coupled with the assurance that 'whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and whoso believeth not shall be damned,' is the foundation of most religious persecution. Every word in that passage has been fire and fagot, whip and sword, chain and dungeon. That one passage has probably caused more agony among men, women, and children than all the passages of all other books that were ever printed. Now this passage was not in the book of Mark, when originally written, but was put there many years after the gentleman who evolved the book of Mark from his inner consciousnes had passed away. It was put there by the church—that is to say, by hypocrisy and priestly craft—to bind the consciences of men and force them to come under ecclesiastical and spiritual power; and that passage has been received and believed, and been made binding by law in most countries ever since. What would you think of a law compelling a man to admire Shakspere, or calling it blasphemy to laugh at 'Hamlet?' Why is not a statute necessary to uphold the reputation of Raphael or of Michael Angelo? Is it possible that God cannot write a book good enough, great enough, and grand enough not to excite the laughter of his children? Is it possible that he is compelled to hav his literary reputation supported by the state of Delaware?

"There is another very strange thing about this business. Admitting that the Bible is the work of God, it is not any more his work than are the sun, the moon, and the stars, or the earth; and if for disbelieving the Bible we are to be damned forever, we ought to be equally damned for a mistake in geology or astronomy. The idea of allowing a man to go to heaven who swears that the earth is flat, and damning a fellow who thinks it is round, but who has his honest doubts about Joshua, seems to me to be perfectly absurd. It seems to me that in this view of it, it is just as necessary to be right on the subject of the equator as on the doctrin of infant baptism."

"What," queried the Eagle correspondent, "was, in your judgment, the motiv of Judge Comegys? Is he a personal enemy of yours? Hav you ever met him? Hav you any idea what reasons he had for attacking you?"

"I don't know the gentleman personally. Outside of the political reason I hav intimated I do not know why he attacked me. I once delivered a lecture entitled 'What Must We Do to be Saved?' in this city of Wilmington, and in that lecture I proceeded to show, or at least to try to show, that Matthew, Mark, and Luke knew nothing about Christianity as it is understood in Delaware; and I also endeavored to show that all men hav an equal right to think, and that a man is only under obligation to be honest with himself and with all men, and that he is not accountable for the amount of mind that he has been endowed with—otherwise it might be that Judge Comegys himself would be damned—but that he is only accountable for the use he makes of what little mind he has received. I held that the safest thing for every man was to be absolutely honest and to express his honest thought. After the delivery of this lecture various ministers in Wilmington began replying, and after the preaching of twenty or thirty sermons, not one of which, considered as a reply, was a success, I presume it occurred to these ministers that the shortest and easiest way would be to hav me indicted and imprisoned. In this I entirely agree with them. It is the old and time-honored way. I believe it is, as it always has been, easier to kill two Infidels than to answer one; and if Christianity expects to stem the tide that is now slowly rising over the intellectual world, it must be done by brute force, and by brute force alone. And it must be done pretty soon, or they will not hav the brute force. It is doubtful if they hav a majority of the people of the civilized world on their side to-day. No heretic ever would hav been burned if he could hav been answered. No theologian ever called for the help of the law until his logic gave out.

"I suppose Judge Comegys to be a Presbyterian. Where did he get his right to be a Presbyterian? Where did he get his right to decide which creed is the correct one? How did he dare to pit his little brain against the word of God? He mav say his father was a Presbyterian. But what was his grandfather? If he will only go back far enough he will, in all probability, find that his ancestors were Catholics, and if he will go back a little further still, that they were barbarians; that, at one time, they were naked and had snakes tattoed on their bodies. What right had they to change? Does he not perceive that had the savages passed the same kind of laws that now exist in Delaware they could hav prevented any change in belief? They would hav had a whipping-post, too, and they would hav said, 'Any gentleman found without snakes tattooed upon his body shall be held guilty of blasphemy;' and all the ancestors of this judge and of those ministers would hav said, Amen!

"What right had the first Presbyterian to be a Presbyterian? He must hav been a blasphemer first.

"A small dose of pillory might hav changed his religion. Does this judge think that Delaware is incapable of any improvement in a religious point of view? Does he think that the Presbyterians of Delaware are not only the best now, but that they will forever be the best that God can make? Is there to be no advancement? Has there been no advancement? Are the pillory and the whipping-post to be used to prevent an excess of thought in the county of New Castle? Has the county ever been troubled that way? Has this judge ever had symptoms of any such disease? Now, I want it understood that I like this judge, and that my principal reason for liking him is that he is the last of his race! He will be so inundated with the ridicule of mankind that no other chief justice in Delaware, or anywhere else, will ever follow his illustrious example. The next judge will say, 'So far as I am concerned, the Lord may attend to his own business, and deal with Infidels as he may see proper.' Thus great good has been accomplished by this judge; which shows, as Burns puts it, that a pot can be boiled, even if the devil tries to prevent it."

"How will this action of Delaware, in your opinion, affect the other states?"

"Probably a few other states needed an example exactly of this kind. New Jersey, in all probability, will say, 'Delaware is perfectly ridiculous,' and yet had Delaware waited awhile New Jersey might hav done the same thing! Maryland will exclaim, 'Did you ever see such a fool!' And yet I was threatened in that state. The average American citizen, taking into consideration the fact that we are blest or cursed with about one hundred thousand preachers, and that these preachers preach on the average one hundred thousand sermons a week—some of which are heard clear through—will unquestionably hold that a man who happens to differ with all these parsons ought to hav and shall hav the privilege of expressing his mind; and that the one hundred thousand clergymen ought to be able to put down the one man who happens to disagree with them without calling on the army or navy to do it, especially when it is taken into consideration that an infinit God is already on their side. Under these circumstances the average American will say, 'Let him talk, and let the hundred thousand preachers answer him to their hearts' content.' So that, in my judgment, the result of the action of Delaware will be, first, to Liberalize all other states, and finally to Liberalize Delaware itself. In many of the states they hav the same idiotic kind of laws as those found in Delaware—with the exception of those blessed institutions for the spread of the gospel known as the pillory and the whipping-post. There is a law in Maine by which a man can be put into the penitentiary for denying the providence of God and the day of judgment. There are similar laws in most of the New England states. One can be imprisoned in Maryland for a like offense. In North Carolina no man can hold office that has not a certain religious belief; and so in several other of the Southern states. In half the states of this Union, if my wife and children should be murdered before my eyes, I would not be allowed in a court of justice to tell who the murderer was. You see that for hundreds of years Christianity has endeavored to put the brand of infamy on every intellectual brow."

"I see," pursued our inquirer, "that one objection to your lectures urged by Judge Comegys on the grand jury is that they tend to a breach of the peace —to riot and bloodshed."

"Yes; Judge Comegys seems to be afraid that people who love their enemies will mob their friends. He is afraid that those disciples who, when smitten on one cheek turn the other to be smitten also, will get up a riot. He seems to imagin that good Christians feel called upon to violate the commands of the Lord in defense of the Lord's reputation. If Christianity produces people who cannot hear their doctrins discussed without raising mobs and shedding blood, the sooner it is stopped being preached the better.

"There is not the slightest danger of any Infidel attacking a Christian for his belief, and there never will be an Infidel mob for such a purpose. Christians can teach and preach their views to their hearts' content. They can send all unbelievers to an eternal hell, if it gives them the least pleasure, and they may bang their Bibles as long as their fists last, but no Infidel will be in danger of raising a riot to stop them or put them down by brute force, or even by an appeal to the law, and I would advise Judge Comegys, if he wishes to compliment Christianity, to change his language and say that he feared a breach of the peace might be committed by the Infidels—not by the Christians. He may possibly hav thought that it was my intention to attack his state. But I can assure him that if ever I start a warfare of that kind I shall take some state of my size. There is no glory to be won in wringing the neck of a 'blue hen!'"

"I should judge, Colonel, that you are prejudiced against the state of Delaware?"

"Not by any means. Oh, no! I know a great many splendid people in Delaware, and since I hav known more of their surroundings my admiration for them has increased. They are, on the whole, a very good people in that state. They hav of course their peculiarities. I heard a story the other day: An old fellow in Delaware has been for the last twenty or thirty years gathering peaches there in their season —a kind of peach tramp. One day last fall, just as the season closed, he was leaning sadly against a tree. 'Boys,' said he, 'I'd like to come back to Delaware a hundred years from now.' The boys asked, 'What for?' The old fellow replied, 'Just to see how d—— little they'd get the baskets by that time!' And it occurred to me that people who insist that twenty-two quarts make a bushel should be as quiet as possible on the subject of blasphemy."

And the Colonel lighted a cigar, and handed the box around and said, "I guess you hav enough for this evening."

Conclusiv on the Junius Question.

"Junius Unmasked," says Mr. Underwood, "is, in my opinion, a weak performance. The essay of Prof. Denslow is, to my mind, quite conclusiv."

Now for a bit of logic. Prof. Denslow, in his essay, says, in regard to that "weak performance," that "its argument, derived from unity of literary style, mental characteristics, identical beliefs, and other internal evidence, is conclusiv." And now Mr. Underwood indorses that conclusion.

Again, Mr. Underwood labors through half a column to prove that Phillip Francis was Junius. But Prof. Denslow argues at much greater length in his essay to prove that Francis was not Junius, and "that essay," Mr. Underwood says, "is, to his mind, quite conclusiv."

Again, Mr. Underwood argues that the style of Paine is not identical with or equal to that of Junius. But Prof. Denslow asserts and argues the contrary, and Mr. Underwood accepts the professor's argument as "conclusiv."

Once more, Mr. Underwood is quite certain that Francis was Junius; but Prof. Denslow says, "Francis was a hard and meager writer, without imagination, beauty, grace, variety, or even fluency, without philosophy or rhetoric," and the professor's essay is, to Mr. Underwood's mind, conclusiv.

In view of such self-contradictions, the most charitable supposition is that Mr. Underwood has not read Prof. Denslow's essays. And this suspicion is confirmed by his speaking of them in the singular number, when there are two. I am also inclined to think that my adversary has scarcely read anything that I hav written. At all events, when he says that I "hav not given one fact that goes to show that Paine was Junius," the assertion will pass for what it was worth, coming from such a "profound and able reasoner."

Here I might rest, but lest any one should be misled by the other points he raises, I will answer them all. It is certainly too sweeping an assertion that "the acutest minds of England, and men of letters generally, hav inclined strongly to the opinion that Phillip Francis was Junius." But for the indorsement of the claim by Lord Macaulay, I doubt whether it would hav stood any better than any of the numerous others before it. Macaulay, though a scholar, was no critic, and his logic on this question has been justly characterized by the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, in the International Review, as a non-sequitur. Nor did Macaulay, as Mr. Underwood affirms, adduce any new testimony; he merely reviewed a work by John Taylor, who first set up the claims in favor of Francis in 1816. But unfortunately the five points of Taylor's argument are all founded on unauthenticated letters, first brought to light by Woodfall's son in 1812, few of which are genuin.

The recent affirmation by Mr. Trevelyan, that his uncle, Macaulay, set the Junius controversy forever at rest is treated by a reviewer in the Nation with derision. Two points raised by my adversary against the identity of Junius and Paine are precisely the same as two of the four presented by Col. Ingersoll, and one of them is the only reasonable objection which Prof. Denslow, in his second essay, was able to raise. They were both answered by me in three Liberal papers last fall, and as Prof. Denslow has since given up his only objection, it is unnecessary for me to repeat the answer thereto, or to the other objection which Mr. Underwood raises, who, I presume, did not read my article. W. S. Bell complimented me by saying that he considered my argument completely unanswerable.

The assertion that Paine "did not make outrageous and libelous assaults upon individuals," publishing his attacks anonymously, etc., is refuted by the fact that he assailed Silas Deane anonymously, and incurred the censure of Congress for what they deemed an outrageous libel. And a further refutation is found in the "Crisis Extraordinary," of August 9, 1775, which the librarian of Congress declares to be by Paine. That anonymous publication assailed Gen. Gage as vindictivly and furiously as Junius ever assailed King George or any of his villainous ministers. And the other twenty-nine numbers of the "Crisis" of 1775-6, written by "Casca," i. e., Paine, are full of such anonymous assaults.

Another objection raised is that Paine declares "the cause of America made him an author." That cause crops out in the Junius letters from first to last. Nor did Junius expect to become an author, for he wrote privately to Woodfall, July 17, 1769, asking him to correct another publisher's reprint of his letters, saying, "I did not expect more than the life of a newspaper, but if this man will keep me alive, let me liv without being offensiv."

One point only remains to be considered. It is said that in January, 1772, King George remarked to a friend, "Junius is known, and will write no more." Junius ceased to write January 21st, and "soon after," says Mr. Underwood (it was a year and a half), "Francis received a foreign appointment." How remarkable that the king should hav heard what Woodfall had known for some time, to-wit, that Junius was about to stop writting! For about two months Junius had been preparing a dedication and preface for Woodfall, and giving directions about the publication of all his letters in a book, and Woodfall did not conceal the fact from his friends. But that the king or anybody else knew who Junius was is the hight of absurdity. I believe Philip Francis was never suspected till more than forty years had elapsed, and there were forty claimants before him. Not until the lapse of exactly one hundred years to a day was the public announcement made, and the book first exhibited containing the proof, which Prof. Denslow says is cooclusiv, that Paine was the author of the letters of Junius and the Declaration of Independence.

[From Truth.]

A Pair of Moral Specimens.

Anthony Comstock and Samuel Colgate hav gone to Albany to lobby for the bill recently introduced in Comstock's interest, authorizing the agents of his society to make arrests as public officers. In other words, it confers official power on the agents of a private society without imposing any corresponding obligations upon them.

Colgate is the president and pious and respectable figurehead of this society, of which Comstock is the brains and stomach. Colgate's greatest claim to notoriety, however, is that a proceeding was instituted against him not long ago for sending through the mails a circular giving information of an immoral character. The circular was sent in response to a decoy request, after the manner of Comstock, and was received by the decoy in due course of mail, and in one of Colgate's business envelopes.

The case against Colgate was precisely like that against Dr. E. B. Foote, in which that gentleman was fined $3,000, except that Colgate's circular was unquestionably immoral and illegal, while the book sent by Dr. Foote was a legitimate publication, and he would hav been acquitted had not Judge Benedict in effect directed the jury to find a verdict against him. The proof of mailing was precisely the same, and Colgate's defense was precisely the one offered by Dr. Foote, which Judge Benedict repudiated, namely, that the actual mailing was done by a clerk.

But Comstock, interceding with District-Attorney Woodford, also a member of the society, procured the release of the "respectable" president without a hearing, although the magistrate and Mr. Fiero, the assistant district attorney, both believed the case to be one within the law.

Colgate goes to Albany to giv respectability and tone to the movement in behalf of Comstock's bill. Great heavens!

But Comstock goes to do the work. He will buttonhole the members, and, with that repulsiv smile known so well to all the officials of New York who hav been disgusted by it, will argue the necessity of investing him with all the authorities of a sheriff or policeman respecting arrests.

There is no one more restlessly eager to acquire a name and fame for saintliness by employing deceitful traps and double-dealing to make and capture victims than Anthony Comstock, and the war-whoops in which he indulges when they are sentenced, and he can add their names to his list of victims, would be creditable to a Comanche.

Nor does his malignity end with conviction and sentence. If any unfortunate case appears, and some one, moved by the ordinary feelings of humanity, endeavors to procure a mitigation of punishment, Comstock flies in fury to the front, demanding that no quarter, no mercy, be shown the victim, not infrequently the victim of Comstock's own traps, without which no crime would hav been committed. He was never known to be merciful. Father, mother, sister, wife, or child of a victim of his malignity is to him but an outcast, deserving no consideration, and only the cold pity of the Pharisee.

Not content with the scavenger work of personally detecting crime and making himself a witness, he has more than once created crime to which he has testified, and it has been reasonably suspected that he has fixed it sometimes upon innocent people. But his malignity is none the less in such cases.

This, in a general way, is Anthony Comstock. To descend into particulars would be to paint him in the most disgusting form consistent with the slightest semblance of humanity.

And he wants irresponsible power to make arrests. And such a man as Colgate asks it for him, playing the part of moral guarantee.

Will the legislature confer such power upon such a man?

Will they confer it upon any one?

My Religious Creed.

I believe the universe eternally did exist, and is governed by immutable laws and forces, inherent in or pertaining to matter, but to what extent these laws and forces may represent organized intelligence I know not.

Does any man know more of an infinit God? Can the finite comprehend the infinit?

I desire a progressiv immortality with the retention of all the mental and moral constituents of my present being.

I believe in the practice of liberty, justice, goodness, and truth.

And that by the strict observance of these and other virtues will be secured the greatest happiness possible to be obtained in this life, and all future life, if there is any.

I do not believe it is possible to drive a sharp bargain with the great laws of nature, and cheat justice by securing an eternity of ecstatic bliss by prayer, and a few duties performed, mainly inspired by the fear of hell.

I do not believe any reward should be expected in this or any other world beyond what is honestly earned or paid for.

I believe in individual responsibility, according to ability and no more.

I believe man's individuality, with all his powers and weaknesses, is the result of laws and forces in nature, over which he had no control.

I do not believe in taking as authority the opinion or say-so of any person on subjects clearly unknowable, or on those that cannot be demonstrated by facts or science.

Inasmuch as no infallible judge of what is right and what is wrong has as yet ever made his or her appearance to me, I claim the right to decide for myself according to my best judgment.

I do not believe in the doctrin that some men can, and ought as a religious duty, assist the Almighty in compelling all other persons to believe just as they themselvs believe.

But I do believe this arrogant, wicked, and God-dishonoring claim, has been, and still is the main cause of all the religious persecutions and murders for God's sake.

I believe in according to all other persons the same right to believe or disbelieve that I claim for myself.

One of the handsomest of publications is the Illustrated Scientific News, published by Munn & Co., New York. Every number contains thirty-two pages, full of engravings of novelties in science and the useful arts. Ornamental wood work, pottery, vases, and objects of modern and ancient art are finely shown. The March number contains, among various other subjects illustrated, a full description of the manufacture of paper hangings, with engravings; how the deceptiv curve is produced in casting the ball by the baseball pitcher, his attitude, how he holds and handles the ball, all fully illustrated. The number before us also contains engravings of Capt. Eads' proposed ship railway across the Isthmus, and a novel hydraulic railway locomotiv. In addition to all this it contains many valuable recipes for artisans and housekeepers. This publication will be found instructiv and entertaining to all classes, but will be best appreciated by the most intelligent. Published by Munn & Co., 37 Park Row, New York, at $1.50 a year, and sold by all news dealers.

Letters from Friends.

WILKE ARRE, PA., Feb. 25, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I feel sure that I can sell from ten to fifty copies of the book if you are to take the trip around the world, in this city, and I shall make an effort to do so. I am sorry that we cannot hav twice the matter within the noble TRUTH SEEKER. That is, swell it big with the thoughts of the advancing tide of freedom.

The world needs its truths repeated in every shape until the old is completely rooted out.

Inclosed please find two dollars, price of "Antichrist," which please send me and oblige,

Yours truly, J. R. PERRY.

ST. THOMAS, ONT., CAN., Feb. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen Ed. O'Donnell, A. Harrison, Ed. Swift, and friend, who I think will pledge $5.00 also. The three named hav pledged $5.00 to the around the world trip. I see I am the first from Canada to pledge to that trip. I hope to see a great many more. Your friend and well-wisher,

D. NEILSON.

DAYTON, W. T., Feb. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: If you start around the world call on me for $5.00. J. M. GORMAN.

SKANEATELES, N. Y., Feb. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: If you decide to make a journey around the world you may call on me for $5.00. Should your letters prove as interesting as those from Europe I shall consider the money well invested.

Yours truly, JOHN L. MASON.

HORTON, MICH., Feb. 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $3 to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Also put me down for $5 for your trip around the world.

I remain very truly yours, ISAAC THORPE.

FOXBURG, Feb. 7, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: Please put down my name for $5.00 on the list for a trip around the world.

Yours fraternally, G. C. FINK.

EUREKA, CAL., Jan. 25, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: A year has rolled around and the time to renew my subscription has returned. Inclosed you will find post-office order for the amount.

But now allow me to congratulate you on your safe return from Europe. I am no doubt behind the time with my congratulations, yet late is better than never.

I assure you I hav taken a lively interest in your travels, and hav often stolen the hours from sleep to read your letters from Europe. I, like you, love to travel, more from a desire for information than curiosity; but want of the thing needful has for many years obliged me to stay on the little island in Humboldt Bay, of which I am monarch.

The idea advanced in a late issue of your paper, that a fund be raised to defray your traveling expenses to other countries, and your offer in regard to it, strikes me me very favorably. Count me as one of the subscribers, and any time when the money is wanted I will send it.

Traveling improves the mind, and I was glad when I learned from your letters that you had given up the folly of drinking water when you could get wine for nearly the same price. When will people ever get sense enough to learn that the moderate use of wine is not injurious? I wish you were here just now, for I hav a few bottles of excellent "Angelica" right here at my elbow, and I could hav no greater pleasure than to empty a bottle with you. Of course, neither of us will ever justify intemperance. I abhor it; but it is silly in the extreme to advocate total abstinence.

I like the new dress of your paper, yet a little incident occurred on reading the first number for which the editor of the Rockland Advertiser and Moses Hull owe me an apology. I was reading of Slade's mediumship, but before getting fairly through I was seized with violent vomiting and choking in the throat. The story was evidently too much for me, and I was unable to get it down. My stomach seems to get weaker as I grow older. When but a tender youth I swallowed the whole Lutheran creed without the slightest inconvenience, and it set tolerably well on my stomach for a dozen years, but since I hav vomited that up nothing will stick to me but plain facts. I wish you would tell the two gentlemen not to make their pills so strong in future if they intend to distribute them among the public.

I am very sorry at the course Robert Ingersoll has taken in regard to the Comstock laws. Can it be possible the Colonel is licking up again what he has vomited? He certainly must know that an espionage of whatever kind is a disgrace to a free government. I am confident if the pope tried to establish an Inquisition in America, Robert Ingersoll would oppose it, yet he upholds a system of espionage fully as contemptible as the Inquisition. Has the Colonel lost his manhood to cringe because some pious frauds frown? I hav thought too much of him to believe that. Yet let us not turn the cold shoulder to him; he has his weak points like other people, and may in riper years see them. Let us take kindly by the hand those who aim to walk in the paths of truth, no matter if their judgment does mislead them sometimes, but let us detest such incorrigible wretches as Abbot and Bundy, who will cringe like whipped pups on an even chance, but stab a man the instant he is helpless, and who treacherously tried to undermine your fair fame in order to build up their own on its ruins.

Fraternally yours, ROBERT GUNTHER.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., Feb. 20, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: We hav a live Liberal League in this place, reports to the contrary notwithstanding; and it is composed of old, staunch Liberals for the most part, who are able to appreciate the magnitude of the great services of Thomas Paine, and they are always glad to demonstrate that fact. At a meeting of the League to-day they contributed two dollars and twenty-five cents (which I herewith inclose) toward repairs on the author-hero's monument at New Rochelle. Mr. George Ballantine contributed one of the dollars. Mr. Ballantine is one of the oldest Liberals in this part of our country, having preached the faith of the Materialist for over half a century. Five times the above amount could hav been raised without difficulty if it had seemed necessary, but we wished to giv the other Leagues a chance to show their patriotism. M. Y. B. HUMPHREY,

Vice-Pres't of League.

P. S.—If you make that contemplated voyage around "God's footstool," you may call on me for five dollars. I shall want the book if I still remain on the outside of said stool. M. Y. B. H.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 14, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will please find $4 to be applied as mentioned.

I received the extra copies you were kind enough to send, and hav distributed them, but am rather disheartened in not getting more than one new subscriber at present. It seems to me people like to be able to use their thoughts and speak freely, and like to peruse the good and excellent essays of our foremost Liberals and Freethinkers, but dreadfully dislike to put their hands in their pockets to assist in disseminating the truths taught in those essays.

If you ask those professing to be Freethinkers and Liberals to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER or any of our Liberal papers, the answer in general will be, "Well, I really cannot afford it;" or, "Oh, well I hav passed through all that, you see, and don't need to know any more on the subject of religion;" and yet these same men will spend from twenty to fifty cents per week in tobacco or beer, and are as ignorant on all anti-theological subjects as Balaam's ass; or some will say, "Well, I would very much like to take the paper, but my wife won't hav it in the house, because her pastor says it's a naughty, bad, Infidel paper." But, Mr. Editor, the fact of the case is, they are too indifferent to the interests of Freethought, and it really does dishearten a person to mix with such indifferent and disinterested Liberals.

Where one takes a Freethought paper there ought to be ten. They are all afraid of public opinion, and hav but a moiety of principle in them.

I am very sorry to see by your paper that the monument of Thomas Paine has been so desecrated by ruthless hands; but I trust the Freethinkers of America will be liberal enough to raise the necessary amount for repairs. Though but a workingman myself, yet I must find a way to spare a little for so good an object.

With respect to your proposed trip around the world, I, though sadly deficient of the "needful" at present, shall take a $5 ticket for the journey with you, for I must say you hav a knack of writing your travels that goes straight to the comprehension of the most illiterate. Indeed, I really enjoyed your "Infidel Abroad," or letters from Europe, like a romance, and I believe all will enjoy a trip with you around the world.

I am happy to inform you that Thomas Paine's birthday was celebrated by the Freethinkers of the City of Brotherly Love in a very appropriate manner.

Now, dear friend, as time is precious with you, I will close, hoping that yourself and better half are enjoying good health this unfavorable winter, I remain, Respectfully yours, WM. F. PORTER.

GREEN HILL, OHIO, Feb. 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: If you take that trip around the world, just dot me down for $5 to help you on your way. I would like it if you would visit the cities of the plains and investigate that pillar of salt, if you can find it, and see if it is the wife of dear old righteous Lot, and what became of him and his two daughters after they came out of the cave. I will hold myself in readiness to forward the money whenever you want it. I want the books if you go, and the "Infidel Abroad."

Yours for around the world, ENOCH WICKERSHAM.

VANCOUVER, W. T., Feb. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am also in for five dollars for your trip around the world. Please let me know when you contemplate starting, and I will remit.

Yours truly, IRA WEAVER.

DRIFTWOOD, PA., Feb. 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As regards the trip around the world, I am willing to contribute $5 toward helping the good cause. JAMES W. COYLE.

JOLIET, ILL., Feb. 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: It is a little late to extend congratulations to our much-loved paper in its new dress. It is a decided improvement. I like it, and I am glad that you are home again, and in my selfishness I hope you will remain there. I enjoyed your letters from abroad very much. But is there not enough for you to do here? It seems to me that every brave soldier is needed now and here. We hav only a little way to look to discover the hydra-head of oppression all around us, none need to ask where, or in what direction. And after your bitter persecution, who so well fitted to aid our brave army of teachers in their labor of love to humanity as you? There are many reasons why I should be glad to see you go—and to help you do so if it were possible—but it seems to me that you are greatly needed here, for the present at least. My blood boils with indignation when I see the contemptible persecutions that are heaped upon our only brave and true workers for the truth, and from our so-called Christians. But then, my good brother, what may we not expect from man-made creeds, Bible, devil, and all? Nothing that may come from that source will ever surprise me. Very respectfully yours for all truth, MARY L. MILLSPAUGH.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Jan. 27, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Your kind and sympathizing letter reached me by yesterday's mail. Thanks, many thanks, for your kind and generous sympathy. I never receive a letter from you but that I think and wonder how it is that people can abuse and misrepresent such a noble, self-sacrificing man as you hav ever proved yourself to be. How few there are in all of this country who dare continue to go on doing battle for the right, stemming the tide of oppression and persecution, all for the good of humanity, with the hell-hounds of superstition continually at their heels, and ninety-nine out of every hundred who profess to be the friends of the cause which they are defending standing quietly looking on with folded arms, as much as to say, "Go it, old woman; go it bear; I will take to my embrace the one who comes out ahead in the fight."

How true the sentiment expressed in these words, "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn!" But thus has it been since the history of our race began. The reformers of our generation hav been persecuted, tortured, and put to death; by the generations that hav followed they hav been honored and deified. There is not a score of people to-day in this nation who could go through the persecution you hav and keep up as you do. I do hope that those who are able to do so will come forward with the necessary means to send you on a trip around the world, and not let you stay there in THE TRUTH SEEKER office wearing yourself out with overwork. You, at your advanced age of life, cannot long hold out if you continue to work sixteen and eighteen hours each day.

You say in your letter to me: "You must hav a hard, unpleasant time of it, roughing it around as you are. You must hav good courage," etc.

As I hav often said before, I counted the cost before I started in. I enlisted for the war with my eyes open, and I want to say that I hav met with a few good, appreciativ friends in every place I hav visited, and in every case where I hav found a TRUTH SEEKER reader I hav found a friend to the Liberal cause, and in this respect I hav been very fortunate in coming down here into northern Illinois, for I hav been well taken care of since I came here by the following named patrons of your paper, Thomas Goddard and S. D. Goodale, of Duquoin, and John Bulmer, W. A. Thompson, and W. W. Hall, of St. Johns. I owe many thanks to these noble men and their equally noble wives for the kindness I hav received at their hands during this severe cold winter. But fair weather is coming, and I must away and be attending to my master's business, yet I shall retain a post-office address here until I get into the central part of the state.

You hav doubtless read the story about Jacob sending his sons down into Egypt for corn in order to preserve himself and family during the time of a great famin, and how kindly they were treated by the Egyptians. Well, I hav met with an equally generous reception in the Egypt of Illinois; but I hope that I may not be guilty of showing the ingratitude that the children of Israel did when they stole all of the jewelry and precious things they could get their thieving fingers on when they left the country. I would be glad to remain with these good friends longer, but I want to organize a state League in the state of Illinois this spring, and I hav got to be up and doing. Names for membership to the state League come in slowly, but I cannot think that the Liberals of Illinois will let this opportunity to do a good work pass unimproved.

This from your humble friend, F. F. FOLLET.

SITKA, ALASKA, Jan. 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav just read your appeal in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 20th, and hasten to respond in a substantial manner by forwarding you one year's subscription in advance for your brave old paper, and I here express the hope that all your subscribers will help along the car of progress by sending you at least your just dues.

Your letters from Europe in my opinion are more than worth the price of your paper for one year. I was surprised to learn that you were in such straitened circumstances, and I believe it was the general impression that you were making a fortune. [A greater mistake could hardly be made.—ED. T. S.]

Wishing you long life and health, believe me,

Fraternally yours, REUBEN ALBERTSTONE.

THE DALLES, OR., Jan. 25, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Excuse delay, as I hav been trying to get up a club of five, but only succeeded in getting two for a year and two for three months each. But I inclose the names of a few persons to whom it might be well to send THE TRUTH SEEKER. I wonder how any one can think the paper high-priced, about six cents per number. I would rather (and do) economize in other matters and hav my Liberal books and papers. I like that idea of some-one of a colony of Liberals. It would be the oasis in the desert. Many a foot-sore one, weary of living without sympathy and sociability, could there unite in friendly converse. In such a company I believe life would not be one long battle for existence, a constant protecting yourself against your fellow-beings. Of course all would not harmonize, but I think the Golden Rule—that best of all rules, but which no one ever heard a preacher preach from—would be followed closer than among any other class.

I enjoyed Mr. Bennett's letters, and learned a hundred times more from them than from a visit to Europe some years ago.

Please take my name as one of those to contribute $5.00 to the Round the World Fund. I shall feel myself more than repaid by having Mr. Bennett's account of his travels.

There are a great many Catholics and Protestants here, among whom there is the usual amount of evil doing and hypocrisy. The former held their swindling fair some time since, by which their lady managers boasted to hav made (extorted they ought to admit) $100. Immediately after—another time they could not hav agreed so well—the Protestant churches combined in a grand charity ball! No one seems to know whether the proceeds are spent in charity or not. It was laughable to see the ladies and the long-faced preachers carrying the pies and cakes down to the hotel the day of the ball. I wonder what the good lady with whom I boarded last winter would say to the churches giving a ball! She refused to let her daughter go to one with me, saying the preachers, the Bible, religion itself, forbade dancing. For a church-member to go to a dance was to be expelled when she was young, etc.

In the case of The Dalles vs. the Methodist mission the court has decided against the church. A large tract of land, city property, was claimed by the Methodists as having been appropriated by the government to them, but it is proved that they deserted it in 1847, and only when The Dalles built up they returned, claimed the land, and with the church's usual rapacity extorted from the settlers, many poor families among them, a second payment though meantime presenting to the already rich Masons a plot for a hall, the Methodist preacher being one of the fraternity. All honor to Judge Deady for his righteous decision.

Many thousands of cattle and sheep hav died from exposure and starvation. If half the energy and money spent in churches here were expended in trying to ameliorate the condition of suffering animals, enacting laws to compel stock-owners to provide shelter and food, it would be a blessing.

Respectfully, MRS. A. EVEREST.

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As my news dealer has given up the newspaper trade, I will hav to send for your valuable paper myself, as I cannot do without it. I hav taken it for six or seven years. I think it is the best paper in America. You will find inclosed $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will remit again before this expires.

I noticed an article in your issue of the 29th, headed "Slade's Mediumship," by Allen Pringle, in which he makes a sorry attempt to explain the modus operandi of spiritual communications. I fear he has plunged himself into deeper water than he anticipated, so much so that he never will be able to come to the surface again.

Does he undertake to prove that a mind can become surcharged with electricity so that it can see and read what is not in that mind at that time, or that a skull can become transparent? It seems strange that intelligent persons who will not believe the spiritual theory will travel off into the (circumambient) air theory, or transparent skulls, or the surcharging of mind with electricity, or, as some call it, nervous odic force, which surrounds certain peculiar individuals, and other theories too numerous to mention. No man of science in this country or any other country can prove that a mind can be surcharged with electricity so as to pick up a piece of slate-pencil and write a fac simile of some deceased person's handwriting between two slates that are fastened together. All I hav to say is that some people seem ready to believe all sorts of theories, no matter how absurd, which cannot be proved under any circumstances, in preference to the spiritual theory.

As this is my first attempt to write to an editor, I feel somewhat timid, but felt like saying a word on the subject. I would beg your indulgence, and ask you to publish this. As I expect to be completely annihilated by some circumambient-air or transparent-skull theorist, I will not trouble you again.

I say, long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and brother Bennett! Yours for truth, CHAS. L. WATSON.

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Jan. 27, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Although I am not personally acquainted with you, yet since reading the trial copies of your paper, and learning your "religious" sentiments, I beg to be put down on your list of friends. I had no idea there was such an excellent paper as yours is published in the world.

Inclosed find money order for $3 for one year's subscription. I shall do all I can to advance the interest of your paper. I would like my subscription to commence with the paper containing Mrs. Besant's first debate.

As I am preparing myself for the bar, I havn't time nor money now to purchase any of your Liberal books, but expect to get a full supply as soon as I am in a condition to read and enjoy them, which will be in July next. I must work now to be able to earn my bread. With best wishes,

GEORGE M. RAGSDALE.

CORN PLANTER, PA., Feb. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In some respects I consider your paper a remarkable one. It is conducted on a plan more unique than any paper I ever saw. I hav said lately that if any one of average ability would take THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year, read it carefully, and think over its various and divergent blossoms of thought as they bloom every week, he would at the end of that time hav a good, strong mind and clear intellect. And I think so more and more every time I read it. I shall do all I can, in fact, am doing all I can, to bring it to the attention of Liberal-minded people in order that it may extend the area of its usefulness. B. S. MORRISON.

FORESTVILLE, N. Y., Feb. 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Please find inclosed money for the paper another year. As we hav taken it from its infancy I should not know how to do without it now. It answers for me better than going to church on Sunday to hear an orthodox sermon, and many of your correspondents seem like old friends to me, Mrs. Slenker in particular.

I will say to you that my husband, J. W. Bennett, passed away last April. He was always a good friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it now falls on me to do this writing, which he had always attended to. I will close by wishing you success. Yours truly,

MRS. J. W. BENNETT.

BART, PA., Jan. 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find two dollars—one dollar and fifty cents for the "Infidel Abroad," and the remainder for the benefit of R. M. Casey.

It was said of Greeley that he could do the work of two ordinary men. Now it seems you can beat that. I am not apt to blarney and flatter, but you are the boss writer of the age. And in addition to the amount it is sterling good sense.

What a contrast between the Tribune and THE TRUTH SEEKER! The one is bigoted, intolerant, and exclusiv; the other perfectly tolerant, broad, and Liberal, and givs all a hearing. Horace Greeley, although an honest man, could not afford to hav an opinion of his own on religious matters. If the Tribune was a bigot in Greeley's time, it is not less a narrow bigot now. If the New York daily papers had only spoken a good word for their brother of the press you never would hav been sent to prison. They knew as well as you and I that you were innocent of any crime, but, for fear of Mrs. Grundy, had not the courage to say a word for you. Then let the brand of everlasting disgrace, shame, and infamy rest on those mean and cowardly souls.

Very kindly, I. M. KING.

FALL RIVER, MASS., Jan. 27, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find my check for four dollars, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Infidel Abroad," commencing the paper with the next number.

I called on Miss S. H. Wixon last Sunday evening, and she gave me a copy of your paper to read (the first one I ever saw), and I am more than pleased with it, being an Infidel of the toughest kind, having been a subscriber and reader of the Investigator for over thirty years.

I was surprised to find THE TRUTH SEEKER such a large and ably-managed paper, and with such a large list of able correspondents, some of whom I hav known through the Investigator for years—Miss Wixon, for one, whom I hav known from a child to be a female of sterling worth, working for the good of the whole human family, not confined to one church nor one creed, but to benefit the whole, and hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may.

Yours for Freethought, LEMUEL HALL.

ALEXANDRIA, MO., Feb. 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your card received. Your claim is just, and should hav been paid last year. Please find order for $5.35, which pays last year's subscription and $2 on this. Now, by the help of God or the devil, I care not which, I will try and be in arrears no more. I think you publish the best paper in the world, and if I should fail to pay for it I would never expect to enter the kingdom of heaven; though I might be washed in Jesus's blood, it would fail to hav the saving power. I was a subscriber for Bundy's paper for several years. When he took the stand against you I stopped it. You are doing a noble work. Fight on, you will conquer in the end, and then we will hav liberty and justice. If I had the means I would gladly assist in defraying your expenses around the world, but my means are limited.

I am, fraternally yours, V. F. HILL.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, Jan. 25, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for three dollars for your paper for another year. I see my year is out, and I must hav the paper. I am much pleased with the new dress, both in and out, and see no reason why it should not succeed and make its mark while you, Mr. Editor, are at its head. We want more such papers in the land—bold, fearless, outspoken soldiers for truth, justice, and the rights of humanity—to educate the youth of our country for our country's good. Wishing for your welfare and the success of your paper, I remain, as ever, Yours, L. B. DAWSON.

PITTSBURG, PA., Feb. 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been scattering your papers around lively since New Year's. Not only did I giv away the extra paper you sent me at the first of the year, but I hav given away all my own papers since that time, and the result is I hav got for you a good Liberal and I believe a permanent subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Another young man to whom I gave several papers said, when I asked him to subscribe, that he loved to read it, but the folks at home were down on him for reading such a paper, and so he would not promis to take it for some time yet to come. Another gentleman to whom I gave two or three papers said they contained the best reading matter he ever saw, and just suited him; he had two papers laid away to giv to a friend of his when he should first see him, but unfortunately for the papers, his wife discovered them, looked over them, and then burned them, so his friend was deprived of so much Liberal reading matter; but I shall see that he gets some more, as I intend to giv all my papers away and so help the Liberal cause and also the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It is hard to fight orthodoxy in this city as it has got a strong hold of the people, but the young and rising generation is where we will get our work in upon our orthodox friends (or enemies, I should say), and could we draw the ladies' attention away from the churches we would hav the battle for liberty nearly fought, as the influence that sex has over the male sex draws them to which ever side they may chance to be on.

I wish all kinds of success to your contemplated trip around the world. I wish I were able to giv you the "V" required to assist you on your journey; however, I will promis to take the two fat volumes, and will try and hav the money on hand by the time they are published. Fraternally,

H. B. MAXWELL.

BUCHANAN, MICH., Feb. 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You are dealing heavy blows against superstition. THE TRUTH SEEKER comes every week well filled with unanswerable arguments against the impositions of priestcraft and in favor of humanity. Your letters from Europe were replete with the very kind of information we want of the places you visited.

When the American Inquisition imprisoned you they builded better than they knew for the cause of mental liberty. Believe me ever your friend in the cause that is right. JOSEPH COVERNY.

HORNITOS, CAL., Jan. 29, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed please find seven dollars for the paper and books.

I commenced your paper about eighteen months ago as a trial subscriber; am well-satisfied with it; will endeavor to get you more subscribers soon. You can put me down for $5.00 for your trip around the world. With best wishes for your health and welfare, I remain your friend, R. W. BARCROFT.

CHICAGO, ILL., Feb. 23, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Your paper is rapidly increasing in interest. I enjoy reading its able articles, and can indorse much that is contained therein. I read all, holding fast that which most appeals to my sense of reason and right.

Wishing you success in this glorious work, and in your every undertaking, I subscribe myself,

Yours for truth, ELLA S. WICK.

To Elmina Drake Slenker.

BY MRS. H. L. BUCKNER, M.D.

The years, dear friend, are speeding on apace;
  It seems but yester-morn that we did greet
Within thy cot above the old mill-race,
  Where breath of flowers made every oranny sweet.

I close my eyes this stormy winter morn,
  The leaden present from my vision flies,
I see again the rose without a thorn
  That clambered o'er thy porch in wanton guise.

The vine-wreathed columns frame thee standing there,
  Waiting to giv me words of welcome warm;
The summer sunshine falls upon thy hair,
  Adding thereto a shimmering, golden charm.

Again I see thee in thy household ways,
  Intent to do each homely duty well,
Again thy words, through witching twilight haze,
  Weave round my heart their gentle, magic spell.

O brave, true woman! thou hast been my guide
  When I from myths and creeds hav sought to rise,
Dear thoughts of thee, and of thy strength so tried
  Hav borne my spirits up to clearer skies.

Thy hands than mine are stronger unto good,
  Thy feet are swifter in the paths of right,
Thy heart on higher things doth ever brood,
  The borders of thy life are fringed with light.

Whene'er I ponder o'er thy days of care,
  The generous self-denial thou hast known,
A tender fragrance permeates the air
  Like that of spring-time blossoms round me strewn.

From love's rich chalice I now pour to thee
  A "full libation" from my heart's best wine,
And pledge myself, while time remains to me,
  To keep thy precious name on memory's shrine.

Backbone.

When you see a fellow-mortal
  Without fixed and fearless views
Hanging on the skirts of others,
  Walking in their cast-off shoes;
Bowing low to wealth or favor,
  With abject, uncovered head,
Ready to retract or waver,
  Willing to be drove or led,
Walk yourself with firmer bearing,
  Throw your moral shoulders back,
Show your spine has nerve and marrow,
  Just the things which his must lack.
    A stronger word
    Was never heard,
    In sense and tone,
    Than this, Backbone.

When you see a theologian
  Hugging close an ugly creed,
Fearing to reject or question
  Dogmas which his priest may read;
Holding back all noble feeling,
  Choking down each manly view,
Caring more for forms and symbols
  Than to know the good and true,
Walk yourself with firmer bearing,
  Throw your moral shoulders back,
Show your spine has nerve and marrow,
  Just the things which his must lack.
    A stronger word
    Was never heard,
    In sense and tone,
    Than this, Backbone.

When you see a politician
  Crawling through contracted holes,
Begging for some fat position
  In the ring or at the polls,
With no sterling manhood in him,
  Nothing stable, broad, or sound,
Destitute of pluck or ballast,
  Double-sided all around,
Walk yourself with firmer bearing,
  Throw your moral shoulders back,
Show your spine has nerve and marrow,
  Just the things which his must lack.
    A stronger word
    Was never heard,
    In sense and tone,
    Than this, Backbone.

The Iron Crown of Lombardy.

BY J. K. P. BAKER.

Maurice, the Eastern monarch's, thanks,
Inspired the sanguinary Franks
To drive the Lombard from his home
To please the captious pope of Rome
Because the Lombards thought the Son
And Father not in "substance one."
Cæsar nor pope nor Frankish swords
Can dispossess the Lombard hordes.
King Autheris held his creed and crown
Till death, resistless, cut him down.
His queen, Theodolinda, took
As his successor Turin's duke.
She and the pope were in accord,
And soon converted her new lord.
Then all the Lombards, when they knew
He was converted, they were, too,
So exarch, pope, and Lombard king
Could cease their wars, and pray and sing.
The "argument of arms" was done,
And Father, Ghost, and Son were one.
The Arian heresy was cast
Among the rubbish of the past.
But yesterday a theme of strife,
Worth more than wealth or peace or life,
A truth divine with power to make
A thousand martyrs at the stake;
To-day an idle jest, a song,
A mortal heresy, a wrong.
But when he laid his errors down,
The duke received an Iron Crown
Made from a nail of the true cross,
To which the finest gold is dross—
A jewel of the Lombard state,
Conferred by Gregory the Great.
The Lombard kingdom has gone down,
Still there is Lombard's Iron Crown:
And even yet the Milanese
Bow down before it on their knees.

Jesus Will Settle the Bill.

BY STEPHEN WHITE.

It's true I'm a champion sinner,
  Compete with any who will;
But to me the wrong is no matter,
  For Jesus will settle the bill!

I'll be sure and repent while its early,
  But at present will roam at my will;
Just ceasing in time to be sorry,
  And Jesus will settle the bill!

I will steal, I will rob, or I'll murder,
  Or do any dark deed that I will;
Defraud my brother or neighbor,
  For Jesus will settle the bill!

This is the lesson that's taught us,
  By those who the pulpits do fill—
That for every wrong that's done by us
  Kind Jesus will settle the bill!

But reason refuses the credit,
  And holds us our contracts to fill:
And I think at the day of the judgment
  I'll find I must pay my own bill.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY, 129 East 28th st., New York.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualined to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

MEDICAL ELECTRICIAN,

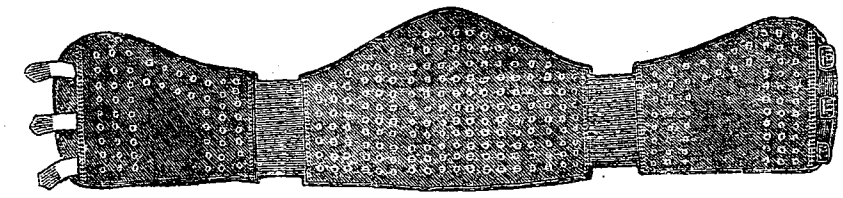
Inventor of the "WILSONIA," and Lecturer on Electrical Therapeutics, Author of "The Trial of Medicine," "The Language of Disease," Medical Fallacies," &c., &c.,

465 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN,

May be Consulted Daily from 10 A.M. to 8 P.M. Free of Charge!

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere pads or plasters which lose their efficacy in a few weeks, but are so scientifically constructed that they WILL LAST FOR TWENTY YEARS, and can be worn by different members of the same family from time to time.

Lung Invigorator.



Chest Protector.

Anklet.

Knee Cap.

Shoulder Belt.

In-Soles.

Sciatica and Lumbago Belt.

DESCRIPTION OF ABOVE GARMENTS.

Each Eylet is a galvanic cell attached to a series of powerful magnets. They are light as ordinary garments, and produce a soothing yet exhilirating effect upon the system, without causing shocks or sores, as in electric belts or galvanic chains.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are the Despair of Physicians, and the Annihilation of Quack Nostrums and Legalized Quackery. Thousands of persons are being constantly hurried on to Apoplexy and Paralysis by the use of Cephalic Snuffs and Washes. Catarrh can be readily cured without any of these nostrums.

THE "WILSONIA" CORSET AND MAGNETIC BELT

For Ladies and Gentlemen will cure Asthma, Catarrh, Loss of Energy, Nervous Debility, Bleeding at the Lungs, Kidney Disease, Tumors, Rheumatism, Gout, Paralysis, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, and every form of Female Weakness.

SEND FOR PRICE LIST Containing THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere plasters which become useless after a few weeks' wear, but they retain their curativ powers for twenty years, and can be worn by any member of the same family from time to time.

Persons who read this notice may wonder that I had not advertised my discovery before. The fact is, I determined when I arrived in America not to publicly advertise until I had five hundred patients in one city, to whom I could refer as evidence. I hav now over one thousand persons in the city of Brooklyn ready to testify that my galvano-magnetic belts will remove and cure every malady known to man, except a rotten lung, and even where the lungs hav begun to decay, my appliances will arrest the decay and heal them.

Here in the city of Brooklyn the paralyzed hav been restored; patients suffering from inflammatory rheumatism hav been taken off their crutches; nerve maladies, bearing on mania, hav been completely cured; martyrs to varicose veins, whose legs hav been bound in elastic stockings for twenty years, hav cut away their bandages, and are now as free from varicose veins as the healthiest person living; children who had never walked from birth up to three, eight, and twelve years of age, are now walking about as other children. In short, the cures effected by my appliances seem so miraculous that the above statements sound like an Arabian Night's tale. Nevertheless, these facts can all be substantiated, and my open letter to the physicians and the Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn must convince the most incredulous that my invention is the most wonderful on record.

My offer of five thousand dollars to the physicians and Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn is still open, and will continue so to be for six months.

I am prepared to go into the hospitals and will only take their incurable cases, suffering from paralysis, locomotor ataxia, inflammatory and chronic rheumatism, congestion of the kidneys, pleuro-pneumonia, or any disease their medicins hav failed to reach—less an absolutely decayed lung.

If the citizens of Brooklyn continue to suffer from any of the above maladies, they hav themselvs to blame.

The cost of my appliances, though seemingly expensiv, is one hundred times cheaper than the present method of purchasing physicians' prescriptions and paying for their drugs.

Send to me for price lists and testimonials, and make full inquiries of those who hav been cured, before you waste your time in calling upon me.

I court the fullest scrutiny, and prefer not selling you goods until you hav inquired of those who hav been cured.

To you who are suffering, and are now under the care of your physicians, prevail on them to call upon me, and acquaint themselvs with my invention before making any statements in regard to the same.

Note the address, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

Male and female assistants always in attendance from 10 o'clock, A.M., till 8 o'clock, P.M.

My appliances are being used with as marked success in England as in Brooklyn and New York

Gems of Thought.

FLOWER in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies:
Hold you here, root and all, in my hand.
Little flower, but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.
—Tennyson.

ONE cannot but respect the temper of the Norseman who was willing to be baptized; but when the missionary represented the alternativ as everlasting damnation, and, in answering to his questioning, assured him all his ancestors, not having heard of the gospel, were in that predicament, withdrew his foot from the water, prefering rather to be damned with his fathers than saved without them.—Dr. F. H. Hedge.

WE do not want women as soldiers and warriors, as jailors and hangmen, or as constables and sheriffs. The world will grow beyond these needs by and by, and until then there will be plenty of men who are coarse, strong, and animal enough for these offices. They grew out of man's dominant, cruel, selfish rule, and to him belongs the work of putting them into force until the sweet, patient, loving rule of woman renders them null and useless.—Elmina D. Slenker.

IN Christian churches it is currently taught that God may justly do what in man would be monstrous cruelty. God is believed to spend eternity in burning alive those of his children who hav disobeyed him, or who hav only not accepted his conditions of salvation; or in subjecting them to tortures of which burning alive would be a faint symbol. But the same act would not for a moment be justified, or be judged as other than monstrous cruelty, in a man.—Samuel Longfellow.

THERE are no two such tyrants in the world as fashion and authority, and yet fashion is only what certain people wear, and authority only what certain people say. Let people change their clothes, and fashion changes. Let them change their opinions, and authority changes. How cheaply do we surrender our independence! If our thought is true, it needs no indorsement. If our action is right, it requires no sanction. Let us no longer follow the false teaching of the church, but the true teaching of reason and conscience.—L. K. Washburn.

IT is far more important that you love your children than that you love Jesus Christ; and why? If he is God, you cannot help him, but you can plant a little flower of happiness in every footstep of the child from the cradle until yo i die in that child's arms. Let me tell you to-day that it is far more important to build a house than to erect a church. The holiest temple beneath the stars is a home that love has built. The most sacred altar in all the wide world is the fireside around which gather father, mother, and children. . . . While I liv I purpose to stand by the folks. —Ingersoll.

I REMEMBER walking, many years since, over a hill in Maine; and seeing the first buttercup of the season, the question rushed upon my mind, What, then, builds that? I stood astonished to the heart before an object so familiar, looking down through it into the great deeps of natural mystery, and the accompanying thought, new then, but never afterward to be overcome, was, the miracle is natural order, not its interruption. But what builds that? Who can answer? This alone we know: the idea of the plant, as an individual whole, is therefore the first to make it a whole.—David A. Wasson.

THE universe is not "full of benevolence and intelligence," as Dr. Dewey asserts, but has wide room for, and actually displays, a vast extent of the opposit qualities. Plague, pestilence, and famin; battle, murder, pain, cruelty, triumphant injustice, affliction of the innocent, ignorance, folly, wrong of all sorts, abound in that little spot of the universe with which we are acquainted. If a principle of goodness be necessary to account for goodness in the universe, then a principle of badness must be necessary to account for badness in the universe. If the unknown principle "must be conceived of as embracing in it an infinit wisdom and goodness" when we look on the fair side of the universe, must it not in equal strictness of logic "be conceived of as embracing in it an infinit" unwisdom and badness when we look on the foul side?—N. R. Waters.

WHEN it is no longer practicable to punish heresy as a crime, men hav practically abandoned the orthodox theory of revelation. Religious persecution belonged to the spirit of past ages, and has been gradually dying out as that spirit has been informed and changed; but it is the proper fruit and action of theology and belief in a fixed, infallible revelation. Believers are now tolerant because the perfect, fervent, compelling faith of the past is no longer possible. They ought, logically, to persecute as fiercely as of yore; but, unconsciously molded by the spirit of the age, it is no longer in them to do so. The leading races of mankind hav now new intuitions and a higher law of life, at whose silent bidding they giv up their theology in its spirit long before the fulness of time, when they shall abandon it in the letter also.—N. R. Waters.

ONE of the most alarming signs of the times in the sphere of thought is the habit prevalent among educated men, who certainly ought to be above such double-dealing, of deliberately obscuring, by a resort to loose figures of speech, or by the use of words of doubtful meaning, the lines by which alone one idea may be clearly distinguished from another. The difficulty of thinking clearly would seem under all circumstances to be naturally sufficiently great to keep people of superior intelligence from deliberate attempts or complicity in attempts to make it more so. But what do we see? Prominent men in religious, and even in scientific, circles persistently lending themselvs to the very unworthy and pernicious business of giving aid and comfort to the popular fallacy that "one thing is as true as another, and no truth is much importance anyhow."—Anon.

Odds and Ends.

SON: "Father, the lecturer at the hall to-night said that lunar rays were only concentrated luminosity of the earth's satellite. What do you think about it?" Intelligent parent: "All moonshine, my son, all moonshine!"

"STILL in fancy do I view thee," was the beginning of a poem he wrote to her when they were courting. They hav been married a year now; and when he nurses the teething baby he does not write anything more about "still infancy."

A DETROITER has been for the last two years collecting and arranging statistics of an odd nature, and if the book is ever published readers will find nothing dry about it. He goes right to business on page one, by estimating that the number of lickings received by the average boy up to the fourteenth year is 125. This includes the spanking process during infancy.

Out of every 100,000 people in this country 19,000 get up cross in the morning, but only a hundred or so remain in that condition very long after breakfast.

Out of 50,000 men about 600 hundred will put up money on a bet. The rest will crawfish around and finally back water on their assertions.

Only ten women out of every 500 who start on a journey by railroad consult a railroad map or hav the least idea of the direction they take. 497 are certain they took the wrong train; 494 wish they had never started.

The risk of being bitten by a dog is greatly overestimated. Out of every 1,000 big and little dogs only two care to get into a row with the human race, and those two are ready and willing to die.

The number of men who can put in a more pleasant evening down town than at their own fireside is on the decrease, and the number of wives who are taking a little extra pains to make home more pleasant than a concert saloon is on the increase.

Out of every 1,000 women who ride on street cars only twelve will move along to offer another woman a chance to sit down; 998 of them agree that it is a man's duty to stand up, even if there is plenty of room, and the other two are supremely indifferent.

Only one woman in 5,000 pays the first price asked for a bonnet, and only one milliner in 1,000,000 expects her to.

The time occupied by the average man in buying a full suit of clothes is just one-fourth the time occupied by the average woman in buying a single pair of stockings.

THERE is an old woman living on Catherine street who delights to find a case that all the doctors hav failed to cure and then go to work with herbs and roots and strange things and try to effect at least an improvement. A few days ago she got hold of a girl with a stiff neck, and she offered an old negro named Uncle Tom Kelly fifty cents to go to the woods and bring her a hornet's nest. This was to be steeped in vinegar and applied to the neck. The old man spent several days along the Holden road, and yesterday morning he secured his prize and brought it home in a basket. When he reached the Central Market he had a few little purchases to make, and after getting some tea at a grocery he placed his basket on a barrel near the stove and went out to look for a beef bone.

It was a dull day for a trade. The grocer sat by the stove rubbing his bald head. His clerk stood at the desk balancing accounts, and three or four men lounging around talked of a new party to be founded on the ruins of Democracy. It was a serene hour. One hundred and fifty hornets had gone to roost in that nest for the winter. The genial atmosphere began to limber them up. One old veteran opened his eyes, rubbed his legs, and said it was the shortest winter he had ever known in all his hornet days. A second shook off the lethargy and seconded the motion, and in five minutes the whole nest was alive and its owners were ready to sail out and investigate. You don't hav to hit a hornet with the broadside of an axe to make him mad. He's mad all over all the time, and he does't care a picayune whether he tackles a humming bird or an elephant.

The grocer was telling one of the boys that he and General Grant were boys together, when he gave a sudden start of surprise. This was followed by several other starts. Then he jumped over a barrel of sugar and yelled like a Pawnee. Some smiled, thinking he was after a funny climax, but it was only a minute before a solemn old farmer jumped three feet high and came down to roll over a job lot of washboards. Then the clerk ducked his head and made a rush for the door. He didn't get there. One of the other men who had been looking up and down to see what could be the matter, felt suddenly called upon to go home. He was going at the rate of forty miles an hour when he collided with the clerk and they rolled on the floor. There was no use to tell the people in that store to move on. They couldn't tarry to save 'em. They all felt the rent was too high, and that they must vacate the premises. A yell over by the cheese-box was answered by a war-whoop from the showcase. A howl from the kerosene barrel near the back door was answered by wild gestures around the show window.

The crowd went out together. Uncle Tom was just coming in with his beef bone. When a larger body meets a smaller one the larger body knocks it into the middle of next week. The old man laid around in the slush until everybody had stepped on him all they wanted to, and then he sat up and asked:

"Hev dey got de fiah all put out yet?"

Some of the hornets sailed out of doors to fall by the wayside, and others waited around on top of barrels and baskets and jars to be slaughtered. It was half a hour before the last one was disposed of, and then Uncle Tom walked in, picked up the nest, and said:

"Mebbe dis will cure de stiffness in dat gal's neck, just de same, but I tell you I'ze got banged, an' bumped, an' sot down on, till it 'll take a hull medical college all winter long to get me so I kin jump off a street kyar!"

Notes and Clippings.

PARK COLLEGE, in Missouri, is preparing thirty-one young men for the Presbyterian ministry.

THERE is a strong probability that the Wisconsin legislature will submit to the people a woman suffrage amendment to the state constitution.

IT is proposed in London to erect a statue of Carlyle on the Thames embankment opposite Cheynerow, and to place a bust of him in Westminster Abbey.

THERE was some doubt at the time as to the genuinness of Dan Rice's conversion to Methodism, and now he is a clown in a circus again, to the great grief of his religious friends.

UPWARD of 2,220 young girls are at present attending the painting and drawing classes in state and municipal schools in France, while 1,950 are studying music in the various colleges.

A RESOLUTION has passed the Texas legislature requiring that women shall be employed in the state department for every position they are competent to fill, upon the same terms and conditions as men.

"HALF-BAKED evangelists" is what a religious paper calls some of the peripatetics who go from church to church with morocco, limp-backed Bibles under their arms, putting on airs as if they were Moody and Sankey.

RECOGNIZING as a fact that life prisoners are notoriously the hardest to manage, for the reason that, however well conducted and industrious they may be, they hav no clemency to expect, an attempt is being made to amend the penal code of California by having life sentences commuted upon the life insurance tables, and permitting the discharge of a prisoner after the term he was likely to liv when sentenced has expired.

THE reverend Beecher is not getting along swimmingly with his revival meetings in Brooklyn. Praying, singing, and exhorting hav been abundant enough for more than a week, but the Holy Ghost does not seem to work worth a cent. No conversions hav been reported. His competitor, the Rev. Talmage, as Holy Ghost director, will soon show whether he is any more capable of bringing fire from heaven. Possibly the wicked may do well to stand from under.

THE officers of the Anti-Monopoly League are now engaged in establishing branch leagues in this and other states. They hav received applications for the formation of leagues in twenty-four states. On Tuesday evening a branch was formed at 42 Beach street, for the first assembly district. About one hundred members were enrolled. The constitution and plan of organization for every district in the city will probably be completed on Saturday.

MISS SCULL, the principal of a Philadelphia public school, taught her pupils that the Roman Catholic religion was untrue and horrible. Father Barry, pastor of the Roman Catholic church in the neighborhood, made a formal complaint to the Board of Education, and asked that Miss Scull be forbidden to assail his religion. The Board is divided on the subject, and a great deal of rancor is the result. Here is another exemplification of Christian love.

THE Christian authorities of Russia easily see the hand of God in the assassination of their late czar, and promptly acknowledge the same; but they will take very good care to execute every poor, unfortunate person who will be found to hav aided in the deed done. Now if it was the hand of God that did it, or if he selected his agents for the work, they should be honored and promoted for doing God's work instead of being sent to the scaffold.

"AND you—are you glad to be relieved from the cares of office?" asked a smart reporter of Mr. Hayes. "Well, no, I cannot say I am particularly glad," replied Mr. Hayes. Undoubtedly he spoke truly, and from the depths of a sorrowful heart. But, alas for Hayes! He has no second chance. No more visiting statesmen; no more doctored returns; no more purchased entrances by the back door into the White House. All that sort of thing and Hayes' greatness hav passed away forever.—Sun.

THE following cablegram has been transmitted: "In the Queen's Bench division, in the action brought by a person named Clarke to recover £500 penalty from Mr. Bradlaugh for having sat and voted in the House of Commons without having taken the oath, Mr. Justice Matthew gave judgment that Bradlaugh's defense that the right to take an affirmation instead of an oath, as allowed in the courts of law, applies also to the House of Commons, was wrong. At Mr. Bradlaugh's request the execution in his case has been stayed in order to allow him to appeal. In the House of Commons this afternoon (Mar. 11) J. E. Gorst (Conservativ member for Chatham) gave notice that he would on Monday next move for a writ for an election at Northampton in room of Mr. Bradlaugh."

THE Sun has the following letter: "A shabby-genteel being, representing himself as a missionary of the American Tract Society, has been making invasions into the quiet and retired homes in South Brooklyn. He called at my house, and the servant answering his call was surprised to see him rush into the hall, and demand to see the 'lady of the house.' When refused, he deliberately proceeded up stairs, to the consternation of the lady. He was intercepted before he reached the top floor, and was ordered out of the house. Thereupon he began to preach religion, and to denounce every one in the place, because he could not sell his books or tracts. He said that no Christian would order him out, and kept up such a continual upbraiding of the lady that she was frightened into buying the almanac which he was peddling for twenty cents. I hav ordered two horse pistols, three clubs, and six pails of water to be kept in readiness for such pious beings hereafter. R. A. R."

EVER since her death, certain of our preachers hav been troubling themselves to divine the fate of Mrs. Cross, or George Eliot, as she is known in literature. They hav written about the subject, prayed about it, and preached about it, as if it was their business to settle it. The Rev. Robert Collyer of the Unitarian church could not let the occasion pass without putting in his word as to the future of George Eliot. "I believe her soul is at rest," said this clergyman, one Sunday, in a sermon on the famous woman. And he told how he magnanimously remarked to "a well-known editor," when the news of her death came, "I'm sorry!" To which the well-known editor replied, with sympathetic nobility of soul, "So am I!" "That was all," said the preacher, sententiously, "and I utter no condemnation beyond that." Sorry for George Eliot's death? What difference would it hav made whether they were or not? And as to George Eliot's fate, what is the value of any one's opinion who holds not the keys of heaven and hell and cannot penetrate into futurity? George Eliot was a great woman and a great artist, and as such she will be held in honor by the world. That we know. Imaginings as to her fate are vain.

Now that some of the work of the revisers of the New Testament has leaked out, the theologians and critics are engaging in sharp work over passages on which new disputes arise. One of these is the passage in the second chapter of Acts, which, according to the old reading, says that the Lord "added to the church daily such as should be saved." The new version reads, "those that were being saved." The old reading has been one of the strongholds of the most severe advocates of the doctrin of the salvation of none but the elect, the idea being that only such as the Lord had chosen for everlasting life had any chance of salvation, and that the rest might take their chances of being damned. The new reading presents the matter in a simply historical light, conveying the idea that those who made profession of religion were really the saved, and not a lot of hypocrits or impostors. This is but one instance of the field which is opened up for good discussion. Theologians whose pens hav grown rusty for want of controversial material will now be busily at work. One of the results of this will be the shedding of a great deal of valuable light from a variety of standpoints on the true meaning of many important passages of scripture.—Sun.

VERY quietly and unostentatiously Mr. Bradlaugh has succeeded in bringing about some highly-desirable results during his Parliamentary career. By a judicious use of his opportunities he has removed an irritating disability connected with religious education in Board schools. Hitherto it has been found that any application to withdraw a child from religious instruction resulted in the child so withdrawn being subjected to various indignities and disadvantages, and that it was difficult to exercise the right given by law. Mr. Bradlaugh conferred with the committee of council on education on this point, and elicited from the government a promis that all sects shall be treated fairly and equally, and that it will deal with any authenticated case of such unfairness as we hav mentioned. This is a valuable point to hav gained, and is one that Freethinking parents will be able to appreciate. Although it is the fashion in some quarters to represent Mr. Bradlaugh as having abandoned many of the views which he advocated outside Parliament, we venture to assert our hearty belief that his conduct in the House of Commons is guided and determined solely by a desire to promote the interest of the people; and we may add, further, our belief that by maintaining an attitude of independent friendliness to the government he will be able to accomplish much more valuable work than could be done by independent hostility to everything and everybody.—The Republican, London.

THE pastor of a church in Weatherford, Tex., recently entertained his congregation with a sermon from the text, "And Pharaoh commanded to giv the children of Israel no more straw." After saying that straw is an important article, good for mourners at camp-meetings, and not bad for beds, besides having been used in old times for making bricks, this pastor proceeded to pitch into one of the church deacons who had been circulating unpleasant rumors about him. He said, "Pharaoh's mean, ignoble, and unprincipled conduct can only be equaled by a deacon of the church in circulating rumors and reports hurtful to the pastor's reputation and influence, which reports are unqualifiedly false." Then he told a fable about a wolf and a goat who were fighting, when suddenly the air became filled with buzzards. "Brethren," said the preacher with great earnestness, "the buzzards are in the air over this church." The congregation were divided in opinion as to whom the alleged buzzards ought to go for first, whether the deacon or the pastor. The pastor continued, "Brethren, only straw should be given this deacon, and until grass rises, then, like Nebuchadnezzar, let him graze." The sermon was not calculated to be spiritually edifying, especially to the deacon's adherents. It is not astonishing that at the business meeting of the church, held a few nights later, the members were out in full force. There was a revival, not of religion, but of pugnacity. One member said something about the braying of the jackass in the lion's skin, while another remarked, "If this thing goes on longer it will boil many degrees hotter, unless more prayer is used." The impression among the outsiders is that this church, which is of the Baptist persuasion, is immersed in hot water, and needs to be set away somewhere in a desert place to cool off.

"Or was I placed here to gather wisdom among the flowers and beneath the thorns? To train my mental faculties? To exercise the biddings of my reason? The aim would be nobler. But that which is my aim should be the aim of all. And yet that is not the case. Sorrow and care concerning bodily wants consume the greater portion of the time of life. Only single hours belong to our intellectual being. Of the millions of our fellow-beings only the few care for the development of their mental powers and the acquirement of high virtues. Nations hav arisen and disappeared again without the slightest conception of such an aim. And why, then, did they liv? Are not the thousands of human beings, who, with confused ideas, in constant darkness, hurry from the cradle to their graves, human beings like myself? The suckling who, without the knowledge that he was, died on his mother's bosom, was he not a human being like myself? Is his destiny different from my own?

"They answer: No, we are not created for this world below. Our destiny lies beyond the horizon of earthly existence. We must through virtue merit a better life. A hell is prepared for vice; a heaven for virtue. But how, if I would already find here below that our virtue deserves rarely a heaven, our vices rarely a hell? Are not heaven and hell inventions of an ignorant past, which for the divine within and without had not yet a language; are they not figurativ representations of the mind, the spirit which seeks a connection between itself and the eternal All? Who has revealed to us a heaven, who a hell? Christians say, God, through his word. But the heathen? and he whom education, fate, and independent thinking has led far from the teachings of his fathers?

I am destined for another world; why must I be in this one? Perhaps in order to prepare myself for the former? But what preparation had the dying suckling? Why did he appear, scarcely conscious of existence, to smile and weep? Am I destined for another world? Why, then, is it veiled from me? Why does no voice from the realm of the dead speak to me?"

With a pale face, Roderick arose at these words of Dillon. "Alas! abbe," cried he, "you! even you! How very unhappy am I! I bore my disease in secret, and was ashamed to expose to others my hidden suffering. In you, only in you, I had confidence; I chose you for my physician. Ah! and with a shudder I see the physician lay bare his wounds, and recognize in them my own!"

At first I was startled by Roderick's violent emotion. I seized his hand and said: "How, dear Roderick, is that which Dillon has said so awful to you? I am sorry to hav made these things the topic of our conversation. But long ago these thoughts were familiar to me; long ago I relinquished my most beautiful hopes, and resigned myself to my cheerless fate, which is the fate of all mortals. Roderick, I also hav suffered like yourself. But I hav now arrived at a conclusion. I will be virtuous, and with this virtue in my arms I will meet my doom without terror and without complaint. If there is a God, and he has with him and in his dominion the sweet word recompense, so highly appreciated even among mortals, alone for us children of the dust no value—then I will perish, perish with the proud consciousness, the repaying satisfaction: 'Thou gavest to me what I did not ask, a life full of tears; but I hav borne it—borne it with courage, borne it in self-denial, and felt myself worthy of imperishableness and a better world. Thou dost not grant it to me. Be it thus! No complaint shall cross my lips. So I am greater than the world-managing fate!'"

Roderick looked gloomily upon the ground. My talk did not seem to please him. He shook his head.

"No, oh, no!" cried he, with painful voice; "I hav too much feeling to become great. I am a human being, and more I would not wish to be. I do not want anything else but that I may not in the universe play the part of a madman, who sees everything without more beautiful than it is in reality. I desire nothing but that the outer world be in harmony with my inner world; that my reason should not delude me, and my heart not betray me. Woe unto me, if I am not rescued from this labyrinth; if you possessed the truth, and I had imbibed my happiness only on the breast of a pious dream, I should only in vain bless my delusion, would in vain sacrifice for it all your truth, and repurchase lost happiness at no price!"

Roderick's complaint moved me. I arose and clasped him in my arms. "Dear Roderick," said I to him, "why then so faint-hearted? Joy also reclines in the lap of truth. Am I not one of the merriest men, in spite of all convictions, which you find so awful? Am I not a tender friend, a pleasant companion, a good relativ? Do I not find pleasure everywhere; and is it not I who gladly givs these things to others? Quiet yourself. Truth is man's happiness, the aim of reason; delusions may, perhaps, be pleasing in dawning childhood's time."

"No, no!" cried Roderick. "I long for this dawning childhood's time after that vernal sky. Your truth strips all blossoms off, and takes the brightness out of nature, and turns the warm heart to ice."

CHAPTER III.

Abbe Dillon, who had thus far listened to us in silence, now arose. "Hear me also," said he. "Both of you will, by the difference of your manner of perception, your fancy, and your mode of reasoning, scarcely ever become of one mind, one faith, one conviction. And your lot is the lot of all humanity. Roderick's pain grieves me. But perhaps I am not so diseased as he at first feared, and may yet hav balm even for him. That you both would inquire after your destiny, into the nature of your being, and concerning the value of your hopes, came not unexpected to me. Both of you bore wounds out of the battle between truth and deception; still the difference between you two is, after all, not so great as you think. The wounds of the one are still bleeding; while those of the other, are, it is true, closed, but by no means healed. A thrust, and their light covering bursts. Both of you stepped out of the beautiful dreams of childhood and beheld that which you hitherto hoped and believed fade like a shadow before the light of growing knowledge. The one wants to return to the old, lovely delusions, and summons for that his feelings and the power of his imagination. He struggles in vain. For it does not grow dark again as long as the light of better knowledge burns. The other arms himself with the pride of reason, and wants to harden himself against the most beautiful desires of nature. He, too, struggles in vain. For so long as his honest heart beats it will beat in accord with his desires."

"How, Dillon, will you rob us of all consolation; even of that, finally, to forget what wretched creatures we are in the universe, if we fully know ourselvs?" cried I in terror.

"In truth," sighed Roderick, "very wretched, the most wretched in the universe! The animal is to be envied, which in irrational blissfulness creeps along, enjoys the merry moments of existence, and disappears, without lamenting the joys of the past, without fearing the darkness of the future, without knowing his fate."

Dillon smiled at us. His look was full of gentle sympathy. He uncovered his head, and the wind played in his thin locks. "Look here," said he, "my hair is snow-white. My life is spent. I expect every day that busy death will knock at my chamber-door. I expect him without trembling, and when he comes, away I fling my crutch, and with pleasure sink into his friendly, outstretched arms. Remember, beloved ones, this is no doing of haughty reason; no consequent of artificial delusion; for my phantasy is lame, and for many years my blood has run slower. But there is yet something else which givs us courage, and I hav found it. I also hav battled and suffered, like you. I also hav been in the desperate mood, like you, where all my hopes broke down. But the angel who has restored me shall also heal your wounds. Be, therefore, not angry if I tear the bandages from them, and let them bleed afresh—bleed to death you shall not. But I am tired. Let us sit down here on the rocks. The evening is lovely. We converse undisturbed."

We followed the invitation of the amiable old man, who spoke with such assurance and cheerfulness that he woud hav imbued even the strongest doubter with confidence.

"I know your condition," said he; "but do not imagin you are the only ones who suffer from these doubts. Every man of some degree of education will finally reach the point where you are as soon as he has roamed long enough, and in vain, about the edge of human knowledge. But few speak of it, fearing to make others, through their comfortless meditations, as miserable as themselvs. Or they conceal their grief, not because they fear to be misunderstood, but to become ridiculous and despised. Many of them take their silent grief with them into their graves. Many of them deaden their grief in sensual extravagance, and while they become vicious in order to replace the loss of higher joys by low ones, they use their rude philosophy as a cloak to hide their mean desires. Many of them make an artificial self-deception, wrap themselvs in delusions, and become the most zealous church-goers, as they were before the most zealous scoffers. Yea, beloved ones, your disease is more general than you thought it to be. It rages in the dark. I hear everywhere regrets at the decay of religion, because the churches become empty, and half of those who still visit them visit them only habitually or for business' sake. I hear the fathers complain that the sons are ashamed to pray. I hear the mothers sigh that the daughters blush to speak an earnest word of God. It is certain that the reading of many an author and the cheering up of the ideas does harm to the ordinary church life. But it is a mistake to believe that with the church religion would be forgotten. God and immortality will never be forgotten. The youth and the maiden cling in solitude to these lofty objects, perishableness becomes their church, and death therein occupies the pulpit. But the youthful powers, too little exercised, soon succumb. The belief in revelation, formerly their support, lies broken there. They are too feeble to hold themselvs up without this support, therefore they soon sink into despondency, which dissolves into some kind of silent desperation and grasps after the sad remedies which I mentioned before."

"Ah!" sighed Roderick; "you hav there related to me my own history."

Dillon answered: "And to you I hav related mine. But that is not yet the end of it. Now, if you will listen to me, I will relate to you also the history of my recovery."

TO BE CONTINUED.

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

VI.—Cain and Abel.

TEXT.—And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden. And Cain knew his wife, and she conceived and bare Enoch; and he builded a city and called the name of the city after the name of his son Enoch.—Genesis, iv, 16, 17.

Next in importance to the creation of man and his fall from a condition of perfect innocence into a state of sin are the multiplication of the species, the worship of the creator, murder, and the institution of cities. Each would be a topic for a long sermon, but they all culminate in the text we hav selected, and for the purpose of our discourse may be considered together.

The rapidity with which each follows the other is somewhat startling; and the indifference of the sacred writer to the theories of modern investigators who presume to assert that a long period of time intervened between the beginning of human procreation and the congregation of the people into cities would be suspicious if it were not conceded that he was the amanuensis of deity. The truth of his narrativ, however, must not be questioned. Upon it depends the civilization of the nineteenth century and the integrity of the Christian religion.

The story of which the text forms a part is one of the most remarkable in sacred history.

Man had eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and had thereby become as God himself, knowing good and evil. And lest he might also eat of the tree of life and become immortal, God ejected him from the garden, and guarded its precious fruit with a flaming sword. Like many other enterprises of the Lord, this was a failure. There is no record that Adam got any of the fruit; but he acquired immortality in some way despite the Almighty, for are not Adam and all his race imbued with immortal souls, for the accommodation of most of which this delightfully good God of the Hebrew and the Christian has prepared an everlasting hell?

After his expulsion from Eden, Adam turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, and Eve devoted herself to family affairs. One fine morning, while Adam was attentivly studying the market reports and wondering where all the competition came from, when he was presumably the only man in the business, he was startled by an exclamation from Eve, who said, "I hav gotten a man from the Lord." Now Adam was meek and long-suffering, but Eve's confession nearly overcame his patience. He restrained himself, however, merely observing that it was possible, but he thought she must be mistaken. No doubt this episode caused Adam much vexation; but if he ever entertained the idea of consulting a divorce lawyer he seems to hav been dissuaded by the birth of Abel, which occurred soon after that of Cain, and in regard to whose paternity Eve made no dark hints, as she had done about that of her first-born.

Cain, like his mother's husband, became a farmer; but Abel was a shepherd.

One day the two brothers brought an offering to the Lord. Cain brought the fruit of the ground and Abel brought the firstlings of his flock. This proceeding has never been explained. There were no priests in those days, and priests hav ever been inseparable, in all religions, from material offerings to God. It has been uncharitably suggested that some priest devised the story as an antediluvian fairy tale to giv a divine origin to those offerings which in all ages and among all peoples hav been so dear to the priestly heart. Far be it from us, however, to impeach the narrativ. It is often difficult to understand the holy Bible; but God's ways are not our ways, and it is enough for us to know that he has given us the dear old book as a sacred legacy. It does not lie in weak, vain, foolish mortals such as we to question the truth of one word which the Almighty has inscribed upon its pages.

Cain and Abel did bring offerings to the Lord before there were any priests. The Bible says so.

But while the Lord had respect unto Abel and his offering, he had none unto Cain and his offering. Judging by human experience, this is somewhat confirmatory of the exclamation of Eve during Cain's infancy, by which she excited momentary jealousy in the meek breast of Adam. There was no apparent cause for the Lord's partiality. Cain brought the best he had produced, and Abel did no more. There must hav been a secret motiv which prompted the divine preference. What more probable than that the Lord should hav despised his own weakness, and vented his disgust upon the innocent result? If Eve spoke truly, and, inexperienced as she then was, probably she did, the Lord certainly knew of Cain's disgraceful origin, and shamefully aware of his own indefensible part in the affair, the very sight of Cain may hav excited his hatred. That would be only natural. And it would rationally account for his ungracious reception of Cain's offering, which is otherwise unaccountable.

As might hav been expected, Cain got mad.

This the Lord noticed and inquired the cause; but Cain was very mad and wouldn't tell him. Apparently, Cain suspected the Lord's motivs. He would hav been a foolish man indeed to get so very angry over so small a matter as the pretense of his anger, and there is just the faintest reason to suppose that his mother had imparted to him the family secret.

His anger rose so high that he killed Abel. Then the Lord wanted to know about it. When he found out, he cursed Cain from the earth. But the curse was vain. Cain didn't vanish.

Growing bitter in his rage, the Lord commanded that the ground should no more yield to his husbandry, and denounced him as a fugitiv and vagabond. This curse, too, was vain. He did not become a vagabond; he builded a city; and though it does not appear that the ground ever yielded him its fruits again, that may hav been for the very excellent reason that he didn't till it. The rashness of this Hebrew God seems to hav been exceeded only by his weakness. His curses were never anything but idle threats.

Nevertheless, Cain was so dismayed at the curse that in terror he exclaimed:

"My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitiv and a vagabond in the earth!" Indeed, in the agony of his fear he forgot that no man lived but his putativ father, Adam, and in tones of supplication he said, "Every one that findeth me shall slay me."

The Lord, hearing this, and either intending to take an unfair advantage of Cain's fears, or himself forgetting that Adam was the only other man alive, put a mark upon Cain "lest any finding him should kill him," the most ingenious plan, if there had really been any danger, of pointing out Cain as the murderer upon whom the righteous wrath of the populace should vent itself.

Thereupon Cain went to the land of Nod, wherever that may be. We hav the authority of the sacred volume for saying that it was east of Eden. But as no one knows where Eden was, the information is about as definit as that legislativ description of a South Carolina county boundary which is officially described as running "through a swamp in a wavy line."

And now comes the most remarkable features of the whole narrativ. In the words of the text, "Cain knew his wife and she conceived and bare Enoch; and he [Cain] builded a city."

Whom could the woman he married hav been? After the murder of Abel, the only living people were Adam, Eve, and Cain himself. She could not hav been Eve, for Eve was Cain's mother, and while under the lax morals of the time that relationship might not hav been an impediment, the supposition is irreconcilable with the fact that Eve continued her marital relations with Adam and bore him several children subsequently to Cain's exile. Moreover, while Adam might hav overlooked Eve's suspicious exclamation reflecting upon the purity of Cain's origin, it is not likely that he would hav permitted her to divide her wifely allegiance between himself and a son as to whose paternity he had reasonable misgivings.

Nor could Cain hav married one of his sisters; for the order of events presented in the sacred narrativ precludes the supposition that any daughters were born to Eve until after Cain's marriage.

There must then hav been other members of the human family besides those the Lord had created and placed in Eden, and Cain must hav married one of these foreigners. This presumption is fortified by the fact that immediately after Cain's wife bore him a son he builded a city. A city must hav inhabitants, and one family of two adults and an infant would hav yielded a very meager municipal census.

Men are saved by faith, and the more unreasonable the proposition the more meritorious the faith. Hence we present this narrativ as one of the dearest treasures in the word of God. He who believes it could not escape salvation if he were to try. The world is destitute of population other than a father, mother, and son; but the son marries a wife, builds a city, and is in mortal terror lest the indignant populace should take his life for a crime he has committed.

Those who believe such rubbish to be of divine inspiration must indeed hav the faith of little children.

And of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Communications.

From a London Friend.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

It was a saying among the ancients that those whom the gods wish to destroy they first drive mad; and Mr. Gladstone, the present head of the English gov ernment, apparently wishes to show his countrymen that it contains much truth. The Irish Coercion bill, which is the all-absorbing topic of the day, is being urged forward by him and his supporters in an almost frenzied haste; and had it not been for the truly patriotic opposition of the handful of Irish members who are faithful to their country it would hav passed into law long since. Such a suspension of liberty as is intended, and reign of terror as will ensue in unhappy Ireland, is in no way compatible with the professed principles of Liberals. Why, the Tories, had they been in office at the present time, would scarcely hav dared to introduce such a measure; and had they done so, would hav been stoutly opposed by the very men who are now supporting it. But Mr. Gladstone, although snubbed by the reigning family and the aristocracy, holds them in profound reverence, and takes his orders from those quarters in a meek, obedient spirit. This is clearly shown by his oppressiv measures, for which his party cannot show that there is the slightest necessity, and his refusal to do anything for the relief of the tenant farmers and peasantry of the country. As long as he can keep in good odor with the landed proprietors, he cares nothing for those who require assistance in their hour of dire necessity. The poor and needy who looked for their salvation to the present ministry, relying on promises which were broken as soon as the end to which they were a means was attained, hav now found to their cost the worth of the words of "Christian" men. They were told from time to time that there was no hurry, their case would be seen into as the fitting opportunity arrived, and as it was patent that nothing was intended to be done for them, they combined and after executing stern justice two or three of their oppressors, their leaders arose, and, deprecating summary executions, considering that more would be attained by legal means, formed the trades union known as the Land League, the members of which dared to object to the system of wholesale eviction, and assisted the homeless and starving thrust out by brutal land-owners, generally Protestant pillars of the church, to die.

In a civilized, enlightened, free, and Christian country such a state of things could not be tolerated for a moment, and the Land League must be put down at any cost, and the first blow was struck by the arrest of its chief promoter, Michael Davitt. This is followed up by the Coercion bill, which is to be retrospectiv in its action, and will also empower any police official to apprehend not only men but women and children, and incrrcerate them for the space of eighteen months without trial, and to show the blind fury of the government, when it was proposed that an amendment should be introduced forbidding arrests to be made between sunset and sunrise, it was overruled. It would be a great pity to deprive the police myrmidons of the pleasure of entering a woman's bed-chamber and compelling her to rise and dress before them preparatory to being hauled off to jail in the dead of night. One would think we were back to the palmy days of the Inquisition, when a woman could be torn from her home and friends to satisfy the sensual lust of some foul-minded priest. Of course she was always carried off on suspicion of heresy, the same as an Irishwoman will now be seized on suspicion of being a stirrer-up of sedition. Splendid opportunities will be given, and greedily seized, for any Jack-in-office to wreak his petty spite on any one who has at any time offended what he considers his dignity.

It does not redound to the credit of the English Radicals that but one of them, Joseph Cowen—all honor to him!—has had the courage to side with the Irish party led by Parnell. Because the latter has made mistakes at times, it seems to be considered that he must needs be always wrong. Doubtless posterity will think of him in a different manner, and will regard him in the same light that we now look upon those who in times past hav fought and struggled for the emancipation of their country from oppression.

We see in the present instance how one evil act will lead on to another. It was found impossible to pass the Coercion bill without proceeding to unconstitutional measures, and so arbitrary power was given to the Speaker of the House of Commons to curtail the right of each member to discuss the question and propose any amendment he considered necessary. This is a decided case of playing with edged tools, and those who introduced the game will eventually find it a losing one for themselvs; for when the Liberals are again in opposition, the government of the day will employ the same tactics, and will at once put the gag on when they fear any of their measures are in danger of being opposed.

However, perhaps it is as well that the people should lose their liberties, as they cannot properly appreciate them. They will then bestir themselvs and set to work to abolish all useless institutions.

. . . . . .

Another shining light from the United States is busy quieting the fears of the elect here that skepticism is gaining ground. The "Rev." Joseph Cook, of Boston, lectured in Liverpool a few days ago on "The Decline of Rationalism." He took for his texts, "The field is the world," and, "Every plant which my heavenly father hath not planted shall be rooted up." He commenced his discourse by saying "it was no news to this city that there were now in the world no foreign lands." I hav struggled with this sentence for some time, and cannot make anything of it. Perhaps some of your readers may be more successful. After apparently endeavoring to prove that Liverpool was greater than the Roman empire in the days of Cæsar, he started on his subject by informing his hearers that he had just arrived fresh from Germany as a student, and wished to speak of the signs of the times in that country. He had found the German theological and evangelistic lecture rooms crowded, and those of the Rationalistic only containing a few students where skepticism still prevailed. Young men were now entering into the service of the church; skepticism was being rapidly overturned, and many of the odious theories of unbelief put forward here were simply crumbs swept out of the doors of the German workshops and offered to us as good food. Strauss' doctrin was overthrown, and both the author and his books were buried.

He made the astounding assertion that no educated man, no skeptic, if he had any learning, would deny at all that the different epistles of Paul were real historic documents which came into existence when they were said to hav appeared. The Infidel theory that two hundred or three hundred years must hav intervened between the crucifixion and the writings of the epistles and gospels was utterly exploded, and Strauss had himself acknowledged such to be the case.

He went on to say that Theodore Parker's system had passed out of repute in America, and he did not know of a single church to-day that followed his doctrin. Unitarianism was declining in Boston, and Infidelity dying out generally in the states, and the whole of the country fast becoming evangelical. At the beginning of this century there was only one church-member out of fifteen of the population of the United States. There was now one in every five, and the prospect was never brighter. If this is true, I should imagin the building trade will soon be looking up in your country, as some more churches will be needed if people are being converted so rapidly.

Like all American sensational preachers, he had a slap at Mormonism, strongly deprecating polygamy and priestly tyranny. It sounds well for a parson to talk of priestly tyranny as if he did not approve of it; but I presume he prefers this article being kept as a monopoly in his own sect.

Is the Rev. Joseph Cook of Boston most knave or fool? Whichever he is, I do not think we hav much to fear from him. He is cunning enough to decline appearing on the platform to defend his creed against the attacks of the Freethought party. He knows full well his inability to meet the arguments of any one of our debaters.

Aid to Repair Paine's Monument.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

The friends of Thomas Paine will probably make up a collection at the next meeting of the Paine Hall Liberal League for the repairing of Paine's Monument at New Rochelle, N. Y. We hope some means may be taken to prevent its being mutilated after it is repaired. Wishing you happiness and prosperity, Respectfully yours, J. P. Mendum.

Obituary.

Died, in this township, on the 16th inst., Mrs. Mary Dewey, wife of Thomas Dewey. Aged 37 years.

Again the icy touch of death has been felt in our midst, and has taken away from us one who was universally respected and loved. Always patient and uncomplaining in bearing her own burden, yet for the sufferings of others she ever had a sympathetic tear. The memory of her kind voice and loving smile will darken many eyes with tears. She was, in the fullest sense, a true, noble lady, an affectionate wife, and a loving mother. She leaves a husband and five children, the youngest only five months old, to mourn their loss. To these we can only giv our heartfelt sympathy. Esau.

Editorial.

That Trip Around the World.

Several hav written to know what the prospects are with reference to it. The prospects look favorable. Over two hundred and fifty persons hav pledged themselvs to advance five dollars each and take a copy of the book, and more pledges are still coming in. The matter lies wholly with our friends. We hav agreed to perform the journey if money enough is advanced to defray the expenses. This promis will be fulfilled on our part. But we learn our first estimate, based upon our European expenses, was too low. By inquiring of the tourist agents we are told that traveling in Asia is more expensiv than in Europe, and that to see the interior of Egypt, Palestine, India, Burmah, China, and Japan, $2,000 or $2,500 will be required. It will be very essential to hav funds enough to make the entire circuit of the earth and to visit the noted places on the route, and a dollar cannot be taken from our business for the purpose. So if the money is not forthcoming the journey will hav to be abandoned.

How do we feel in reference to the matter? We hav two feelings; one is that we would like to see the oriental world and witness the habits and customs of the people. It would giv us an opportunity to learn much and enable us to impart considerable information to our readers. Another feeling is in favor of staying at home. The journey will be long and in many respects tiresome, without any promis of profit. We fear the result it might hav upon our business. We will hav to hire a person to fill our place here, which will be no small expense, and we fear it might be somewhat as it was last year when we went to Europe. Many thought we must hav plenty of money if we could afford to travel, and were quite indifferent about sending in their dues or patronizing THE TRUTH SEEKER publications. Money had not come in so slowly for years. The result was, upon returning home we found the journey had placed us over $300 out of pocket and that a debt of $5,000 stared us in the face. It is not yet all liquidated.

The success of THE TRUTH SEEKER is more dear to us than all other considerations. Rather than it should fail we prefer never to see the opposit side of the globe or again cross the Atlantic Ocean. Although, in case we go, the paper will be left in competent hands, and we believe it will continue as acceptable to our readers as it is now, yet if our absence will militate against its interest, we much prefer to remain at home.

Our sole wish is to do the most good we can and to please friends so far as possible. As politicians say, we are in the hands of our friends. Those who think we can do the most good by making a journey of the world, and writing up and publishing what we see, will continue to make their pledges until enough are made to meet the probable expenses. The names of all such will be inserted in the volumes when published, and to them the work will be dedicated. On the contrary, let those who prefer us to remain at our post at home express their opinion freely. Up to this time, of those who hav thus expressed themselvs twenty to one are in favor of our going. A full and free expression is desired.

Whether we go or stay, our aim will be to do the best we can and to serve the friends of truth to the extent of our ability.

Assassination of the Czar.

This shocking act has caused great consternation among the crowned heads of Europe. It is but natural that every despot should tremble when killing tyrants becomes fashionable. This remedy for curing public evils may well be regarded as terrible, but it may be the only one truly effectiv.

Alexander II. performed some good deeds, prominent among which was the emancipation of 23,000,000 serfs, or slaves, but he was a great tyrant, and sent many hundreds and thousands of poor unfortunates, including the learned and student class, to a miserable, lingering death in the frozen wilds of Siberia. He was at the head of the most despotic government in the world, where political and personal liberty is almost wholly unknown, where even the discussion of political questions is tabooed, and the most obnoxious system of espionage is kept up.

As shocking as was the taking off of the Czar, it is to be hoped the result may be good, that concessions will be made to the masses, and that measures of justice and equality will be inaugurated. It is getting almost too late in the world's history for the continuance of the rule of emperors, kings, and popes. If assassination is the most effectiv remedy that can be brought to bear against them, let assassination then be looked for. There is a limit to peaceful human endurance, and when the evils which afflict mankind can no longer be endured, the most summary measures, though bloody, may be expected.

How is it in our own country? We are cursed with a heartless aristocracy—a despotic rule of wealth. There are a half dozen men in this country who, by robbery and dishonesty, hav hoarded the wealth that in justice belongs to the fifty millions of the American people. Yes, hundreds of thousands are in an abject state of penury and starvation today, while these few money-kings are rolling in their ill-gotten wealth, growing richer and richer, while the poor and starving are daily growing poorer and poorer. Cannot these financial despots take warning by what they see taking place in Europe? Can they expect Americans to be more patient and forbearing than are the downtrodden of Europe? It is possible there is but one school in which despots can learn, and that the same lessons will hav to be repeated here that are taught elsewhere.

Repairing Paine's Monument.

The subscriptions for this necessary work hav not come in as freely as desirable. It would seem that the only monument in the country erected to the memory of the man we so much revere should not go another year in the dilapidated condition in which it now is. The following are the sums donated up to the present time:

M. Reiman,	$5.00	Dr. E. B. Foote,	$1.00
Infidelis,	1.00	H. B. Brown,	1.00
D. M. Bennett,	1.00	Rufus Perkins,	1.00
W. F. Porter,	.25	Augustus Owen,	1.00
G. S. Mc——,	1.00	E. M. Macdonald,	1.00
Wm. T. Costigan,	1.00	W. H. Burr,	2.00
Newark L. League,	5.00	Robt Legg,	.25
John Johnson,	.25	James Levesey,	.25
John Musgrove,	.25	Robert Cardwell,	.25

James Seba,	1.00	G. S. Bradley,	1.00

Let the generous-hearted who honor the memory of Thomas Paine help a little in the needful work.

WILL the person who advertised in the name of "Independent" for correspondents a few weeks ago, please send us her name and address, as we hav lost the same? We hav over two dozen letters for "Independent." Will "Liberty" and "Atheist" also send their addresses?

THE Besant-Hatchard debate on Jesus being a "historical character," and the "influence of Christianity upon the world," is now published in pamphlet form of 100 pages. Mrs. Besant acquitted herself grandly and defeated her opponent on every point. Send for a copy. It will do good missionary work. Price, 25 cents.

MRS. H. S. LAKE is engaged a month at Binghamton, N. Y. After completing her two months' engagement at Port Jervis, she visited this city and delivered a lecture before the Liberal Club, giving great satisfaction. She is a brave, eloquent woman, and is doing much good.

W. F. JAMIESON is engaged in Mauston, Wis., in giving his third course of lectures, embracing five in each. Full houses greet him in almost every town, the interest increasing from the first lecture to the close. He will remain in Wisconsin a few weeks. Address him at Mauston, Wis.

Book Notice.

The Origin of Man; or, The Early Reforms. A Tale of Tails. By J. R. Monroe, M. D., Seymour, Ind., 1881. Price 60 cents.

In sending this little pamphlet out our erratic friend pastes a little slip thereon which reads thus: "To the Editor: If you can take time to glance through this pamphlet, I shall be glad to read any criticism and denunciation you may be pleased to bestow upon it; and should you ever be so unfortunate as to fall into poetry, I will cheerfully bestow upon your production that condemnation you kindly accord to mine."

Bearing this covert threat in mind we shall deal gently with the erring doctor.

The book is a rollicking description of the origin of man, with some philosophical reflections thrown in, gratis, we presume. But in his story of the preacher and the woman Mr. Monroe walks very close to that which in "Cupid's Yokes" he denounces vigorously. It is very Byronic, without that poetical genius which makes Don Juan a classic.

But after giving his passionate muse a free rein the doctor gets down to his subject, which is a tale of tails, and givs his ideas on evolution, which science he intimates, however, is mostly guess-work. This is the way the Doctor thinks he started:

> "At first our parents were but pollywogs,
> Living at leisure in their warm lagoons,
> Or, bathed in sunlight, leaping like the frogs,
> Or climbing in trees, like catamounts or coons."

The first want felt by our ancestors was tails, which, in response to the need, soon grew. Then they were happy till Talmages and Beechers were developed. Reformers seem to be a special aversion of the author of a "Tale of Tails," probably because they are not given to penning Byronic stanzas and slurring science. But he manages to make hits at the church, and a good many strong denunciations of that institution are woven in with the tail which has such a prominent place in the Doctor's heated imagination.

The book will amuse if not instruct, and we presume the doctor would like to sell a million or two copies of it. It can be obtained of the author, or, if preferred to intrust the money to us, we will sell the one we hav got and send to him for another, for we actually could not keep house without it.

Miscellaneous.

New Leagues and Life and Annual Members.

I am happy to report two new auxiliaries as follows: No. 53. Duquin, Ill., Thomas Goddard, Secretary; No. 55. Rochester, N. Y., W. B. Shelly, Secretary.

Also four new life members: Courtlandt Palmer, New York; Alonzo Van Deusen, New York; Wm. McDonnell, Lindsay, Ont., Can.; John H. Dibble, Santa Clara, Cal.

Also nineteen new annual members: B. F. Eggleston, Jackson, Mich.; S. D. Moore, Adrian, Mich.; A. P. Heywood, Houlton, Me.; D. R. Burt, East Dubuque, Ill.; Mrs. J. S. Lenont, Northfield, Minn.; Ward Witham, Janesville, Wis.; Stephen Brewer, Ithaca, N. Y.; Allen Holcomb, Cato, N. Y.; Wm. Root, Cato, N. Y.; Melvie A. Clayton, Cato, N. Y.; Leroy Dutton, Grand Mound, Iowa; J. W. Schelling, Manchester, Iowa; L. B. Potter, Bellevue, Iowa; John Collins, Sr., Athens, Texas; Hector W. Haight, Farmington, Utah; H. W. Southworth, Farmington, Utah; R. H. Schwarz, San Jose, Cal.

These accessions raise the list of life members since the Congress at Chicago to eight, and of annual members to forty-one. One important way to respond to my "ways and means appeal" is to swell this list of life and annual members. Life, $25; annual, $1.

A New League Pamphlet.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The pamphlet to be issued by the Iowa Liberal League will contain about thirty-two octavo pages, and will be the most complete compendium for Liberal organization and propagandism ever published. It will be sent to all officers of the League, committee men, and those who contribute to the cost of its publication. To meet the expense of publication the price has had to be advanced from that first announced. It is 15 cents each, three for 35 cents, eleven for $1. It will be of permanent value to workers in all parts of the country as well as of special interest and importance to those of Iowa. How many thousand shall we hav the pleasure of mailing? Don't all speak at once.

I hav also prepared a church taxation leaflet, to part of which a petition will be attached, which is just the thing for free distribution. 35 cents per hundred; $2.75 per thousand. Printed upon one side only, they are very convenient to paste up in conspicuous places.

More Food for the Vulture.

Comstock was before a committee of the legislature last week, accompanied by Colgate, the president of his society, to urge the passage of a bill empowering him to make arrests and requiring the police and sheriffs to act under orders from his society. Readers of Truth know pretty well who Comstock is, and we took occasion a few days ago to enlighten them about Colgate. The best thing the latter ever did was to make soap, and the best the former ever did was to use it.

In his argument before the committee, Comstock charged that the district attorney's office is in direct opposition to the society in its efforts to suppress obscene literature, and he expressly stated that the district attorney refuses to assist in such suppression, and that there were seventy cases of indictments for vice which Mr. Rollins refuses to try.

This is a matter between Mr. Rollins and Comstock; but we presume that Mr. Rollins understands the duties of his office as well as Comstock can understand them for him. And we should hav reached a pretty pass if the discretion wisely lodged with a prosecuting officer were to be subject to the censorship of Comstock.

Comstock speaks flippantly of these seventy indictments. We know nothing of them; but basing our judgment upon a knowledge of his career, we feel perfectly secure in venturing the assertion that Comstock instigated the offense, if any, in each case.

Gentlemen of the legislature should bear in mind that Comstock does not detect crime already committed, and criminals already guilty. That is neither his business or his practice. His habit is to lead men on to crime and then prosecute them for it. It is not long since a jury in one of his cases, compelled to convict by the palpable fact that the prisoner was guilty, immediately and urgently besought his pardon because the evidence showed that he was tempted into the crime by Comstock, the prosecuting witness. Thus this social vulture makes the cases of which he boasts. And it is to more effectually carry on this system that he now asks greater power and more authority.

How well he is appreciated here may be inferred from the fact that only a little more than a year ago in a case in which he was the only witness, his evidence positiv and uncontradicted, the jury disagreed, six members refusing to convict upon his unsupported testimony—six reputable gentlemen refusing to believe him under oath.

New York members of the legislature will hav no difficulty in dealing with Comstock. They understand him. They know that business is dull with him, and hence his new call upon the legislature.

But members from the country are liable to be deceived by his sanctimonious manner and Pharisaical grin. Hence we suggest to them that it would be well to seriously consider before they giv Mr. Comstock power over the liberties of citizens, and his society authority over public officials.

[From The Jewish Times.]

ome Positiv Facts.

If the Jews merely believed in what is commonly called religion they would hav perished from the face of the earth centuries ago. Religion in the common acceptation of the term is simply the equivalent for sensation. It is emotion without reason. Those who believe in religion, as thus defined, never know, can never know, the name or duration of their religion. This year they are Baptists, next year they are Methodists, the year following Episcopalians, then Congregationalists, and then Unitarians, and so on to the end of the chapter. The next step is Atheism. Men who hav given attention to this subject must hav noticed that all Protestant sects hold to the dogma of free will, and hence it logically follows that the individual members may change their religion as free will dictates. This change is always the result of the emotions influencing the imagination. A revivalist of twenty-horse power, if we may use the illustration, will change the religious convictions of a mere emotional being converted under a revivalist of seven-horse power; a revivalist of forty-horse power will convert the convert of the twenty-horse revivalist, and so on to the end of the chapter. If you know anything of the history of Freethinkers in the United States you must hav observed that nearly all hav graduated through various sects, and all were moved by emotional appeals, until they finally landed in the realms of Freethought. Once there the emotional element in their nature was exhausted, and they experienced reality without ideality. In a word, the great majority became either Atheists or Materialists. As such they were, with rare exceptions, inflexible, moving neither to the right or the left. This in brief is Protestantism, its workings and results.

It is curious to note that when men who hav evolved from Christianity into independent thinkers, such as Atheists, Materialists, and Freethinkers, never afterwards yearn for Christianity. It is a dead letter to them forever. Freethinkers, and all other Liberals, as a rule, are in profound sympathy with the noble ideal of Judaism, especially as regards the undying hope of freeing humanity from the fetters of ignorance and the bonds of superstition through the agencies of knowledge, reason, just laws, and kind actions. Indeed, Epicureans (Freethinkers) were in Talmudical times recognized as one of the seven sects into which the Jews were divided. The authority for this statement is Rabbi Hamburger, a learned German Jew, and author of the very remarkable address entitled "The Non-Jews as treated in the Talmudical Literature,'" now being published in the Hebrew Review. We only wish every independent thinker in the United States could read this broad, noble, and comprehensiv exposition of Judaism as it relates to non-Jews. It is the free will of Judaism embracing and absorbing humanity.

Catholicism does not recognize free will. The Pope is infallible. His bull is law; his edict irrevocable. Catholicism is a military system founded on a religious idea. The Jesuits are the generals, the priests the non-commissioned officers, the worshipers are the rank and file, and the pope is commander-in-chief of all. Who ever heard of free will in an army—in the armies of Russia, Prussia, Austria, France, England, the United States, or any other country? If free will existed the rank and file would be the masters, the officers the slaves. Under the suppression of free will the officers are masters and the rank and file the obedient subjects. This is precisely the condition of Catholicism. Under the law and dogma of the "mother church" there can be no free will. Hence the military character of this world-wide organization. The Catholic is not governed by an ideal; that which directs, controls, and uses him is ecclesiastical law. A system, not a principle, governs his whole life.

The Jew has his religion, but it is founded on an ideal, and this ideal is founded upon principle and reason. He is emotional like the Protestant, but this emotion is controled by reason; he is, like the Catholic, governed by ecclesiastical law, but that law is founded on r. ason. This reason is founded on rational intelligence, and the intelligence comes the eternal Jehovah who so wondrously governs in harmony perfect the universe around and about us. Thus we see that the Jew cannot change his religion like the Protestant, neither can he be subject to an alleged infallible will, like the Catholic. To acknowledge this mortal will would be to confer upon mortal the attributes of deity, which is inconsistent with his exalted ideas of deity; he cannot change his religion, for that would admit that he is bereft of reason. He believes in free will, but it is as a free man. The Jewish ideal of Jehovah is Justice, Mercy, Love; to exalt humanity toward this ideal—no matter how far it falls short of it—is the hope, the eternal hope of the Jewish heart. For this he will endure all, he will suffer persecutions and tortures, the fagot and the flame. The Jew in his ghetto and the Jew in his palace, the Jews the world over, will suffer and die for this ideal. Peoples who hav no ideal perish. Peoples with ideals survive. The Jew has survived, and being true to his ideal, Judaism is eternal.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, sends us a handsome volume, entitled "An Infidel Abroad," consisting of a reprint of the letters which he contributed to his journal while on a tour through Europe. We had occasion to speak of these epistles during the course of their original publication, and we are now very glad to again make their acquaintance. Mr. Bennett is a shrewd observer, and puts his observations on "men and things" into plain English disfigured by no foreign phrases. The book recalls to us the pleasant evening spent at the Hall of Science on Oct. 29, 1880, when the testimonial on behalf of the National Secular Society was presented to the brave martyr for freedom of publication. The literary merit of the book would hav been enhanced by a careful revision of the letters; but, as the author explains in his preface, that was, under the circumstances of the case, impossible, and occasional verbosity must, therefore, be excused. A handsome portrait of Mr. Bennett graces the work, which cannot fail to interest Freethinkers on both sides of the Atlantic.

Woman Without a Soul.

MADE, NOT CREATED.—A PRIESTLY REPLY.—ADAM IN THE GARDEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mrs. Hayden, a pious woman, seeems to hav waked up to the fact that the Bible, Christianity, and priestcraft hav ever combined to degrade her sex to vassalage and serfdom, even charging to her account the "fall of man," original sin, and a world of lost souls for the courteous civility of offering an apple to her husband, or rather her only male and human companion on earth, Adam. And taking the holy Bible account of her existence for evidence, the thought flashes across her mind whether a woman has a soul to save at all, and she writes a long article in the American Wesleyan, a rip-roaring Methodist organ published at Syracuse, N. Y., asking for Bible proof on this point, whether she is a child of God or not. In that paper of Feb. 2, 1881, Rev. A. Spicer Wightman replies to her in the following priestlike and consoling manner:

"Her demand for a specific text for every doctrin taught will involve her sex in serious difficulties. It is not said in the Bible that God breathed into 'woman' the 'breath of life,' and that she became a 'living soul.' Neither is it said that if any 'woman' be in Christ, she is a new creature, or that she was created in the image of God."

Selah! Of course the Bible don't say so, but is it not cruel in the priesthood at this late day to pull the scales from woman's eyes in this way, after having her for its dupe and main support so long? Bible history shows plainly that woman never was "created" but was a manufactured article (as a mechanic manufactures sewing-machines of another kind) out of matter or material already "created."

God worked six days in creating "all things that were ever created," including a man, and then giving a snort into his nose, he became a living entity, and he named him "Adam." After God had finished his job, like a good mechanic, he looked it carefully over and pronounced it a "good," perfect job in which he was "well satisfied." To be sure, the account shows that Adam was about as near an idiot as he could well be, for he did not know good from evil, but he was turned loose in the "Garden of Eden," among the bulls and rams and goats and elephants and snakes and lions and tigers and skunks and lice and fleas and musketoes and lizzards and measles and mumps and small-pox and yellow fever and cholera and fever and ague and rheumatics, to "rough it" as best he could.

As Christian theology claims that God "created" all things out of "nothing," and finished the job with Adam, it is a perfectly logical postulate that the material run a little short on the last job, or Adam would not hav been left in an idiotic condition liable to be seduced and led astray by a "weak, wicked woman!" But from this digression let us return to the "garden," where Adam did not seem to find it entirely congenial among the reptils and bears and wolves and wildcats and ringworms and hyenas and rats and chipmucks and robbins and owls and katydids and tape-worms and pigs and trichinæ. With all the others he saw they had of their kind to get up little tea parties with, and hav church sociables and grab-bags and pious lotteries and sky-larking and a good time; but he was an odd sheep, as it were, and very lonesome. So he spoke to God about it, and he saw the point at once. It was then that God evidently saw the mistake he had made, and probably regretted that he didn't hav any old fragments and fag-ends of "nothing" (his original material) lying around loose out of which to "create" a mate for Adam and place it on an equal footing—but it came in on the "ground flood," as the stock jobbers say.

But the material being all used up he had to resort to the next best thing; so, catching Adam in a deep snooze under a grapevine, he ripped out one of his ribs (already "created"), and made Eve out of that. (I believe that the most pious Christians and profoundly learned theological teachers claim that this accounts for a man having one less rib on his left side than on the right.)

But, as brother Wightman truly says, God did not breathe into her the "breath of life" and she did not become a "living soul" for immortality. She was an after-thought, made for the special pleasure and accommodation of Adam, and that is the light in which the Bible, priestcraft, and Christianity hav always treated and regarded her, under the commands of God to his trusted generals, Moses, David, Solomon, and many other of the old saints and patriarchs of Bible record, to say nothing of St. Paul and his modern self-appointed agents, bummers, and expounders. I am aware this statement is now being vigorously denied, since some of the more enlightened women begin to see the joke and are cutting loose from the priestly bondage to assert their claims in many ways to recognition and usefulness, morally, physically, intellectually. But every woman of information, whether Christian or otherwise, knows that the present advance of woman has been made in spite of the traditions of Christianity and Bible injunctions, and it is a matter of wonder how so few of them see that they are still the chief stay and support of that system of priestcraft that has ever sought to degrade her sex. After being used so long to support the Bible and priestly degradation of her sex, beginning to see where the Bible record places her, and beginning to ask for evidence that she has an immortal soul, it must be comforting to be told in effect that she has no soul, and no hope, on Bible grounds, because that book does not say that God breathed life and soul into a "woman," but only into a "man." And now to rob her of even the mercy imputed to Christ for woman in error, when he said, "Go and sin no more," the American and foreign committee engaged for nine years in revising and correcting the "inspired word of God" in the New Testament, hav struck out that celebrated evidence of mercy and charity and toleration for women, and will expect that the seductions, dalliances, and licentious practices for which the men of God are so notorious as a class, will be condoned, excused or smothered in the future as in the past, by their confiding flocks, so that they may continue to be men "after God's own heart," even as David of old was in his loving care for Uriah's wife, and as Solomon and all the Bible "men of God" were. Selah!

To the deep delver for truth every aid is joyfully welcome, and to such Newman's "Supernatural Religion" is a blazing light. That and Greg's "Creed of Christendom" are two of the most scholarly and irrefutable books that hav appeared since the sage of Ferney mercilessly laid bare the hideousness of the church. In fact he but stripped the veneer from the building, while Greg and Newman have dug around the foundation wall till the whole edifice shakes and topples.—Liberal Paper.

Nativism and Knownothingism.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker, Sir: Your valuable journal is devoted to Freethought and reform. For this reason I hereby beg leave to offer you for publication some free thoughts on a subject with regard to which, in my humble opinion at least, a reform on the part of one class of the American people, for the benefit of another class of them, is very desirable.

Our American Constitution says, "The executiv power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and at another place it says, "No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President." A Constitutional amendment further says, "No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States." From these provisions doubtless emanate what are called Nativism and Knownothingism, in this country.

Nativism and Knownothingism mean an aversion entertained by nativ inhabitants of our American republic, chiefly Anglo-Americans, against those of their fellow-citizens who were not born on American soil, but abroad in foreign lands. This aversion or dislike has caused the adoption, by those who entertain that feeling, of the motto, "Americans should rule America."

There is, however, no cause for such a cry or demand, because the United States of America are exclusivly ruled by Americans, and not by the queen of England, the emperor of Germany, the emperor of Austria, the czar of Russia, the sultan of Turkey, the emperor of Brazil, or any other foreign potentate. They are also not ruled by freemen or citizens of foreign republics. The name "American" means both natural-born and naturalized American citizens. Naturalization, as provided for by our American Constitution, is the investment of an alien with the rights and privileges enjoyed by a natural-born American citizen. By naturalization a foreigner who has emigrated from his nativ land to this country becomes an American and ceases to hav anything further to do, politically, as one of its citizens, with his former country. When, by his own choice, he is being naturalized, he must declare on oath that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he absolutely renounces and abjures forever all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign power, prince, state, and sovereignty whatever. He thus by oath (upon which a man must be trusted and believed until he commits, or is found guilty of, perjury) ceases to be a foreigner and becomes an American, a member of the American people or nation, a citizen of the United States, and not merely a "friend" of his nativ fellow-citizens, that is, not a kind of public nondescript. But as a naturalized citizen he is entitled to vote for and hold public offices, just as well as his nativ American fellow-citizens do this.

Thus "justice is established," which is one of the aims for which the Constitution of the United States, according to its own preamble, has been ordained, and the American principle of equal rights to all, in all matters of public concern, is observed. This noble principle is laid down in the following passage of the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

In flagrant contradiction to justice and to the principle of equal rights to all, in all matters of public concern, Nativism and Knownothingism claim and advocate the exclusiv right of nativ Americans to hold all public offices of honor, profit, and trust in this country. If our American public life be faulty, the fault is surely not the circumstance that America it not exclusivly ruled by nativ Americans, but perhaps the circumstance that we may hav too many public offices and officers in this free country of ours, where the people govern themselvs. The aversion and dislike nativ Americans entertain against their, for this reason, unfortunate naturalized fellow-citizens are sometimes so strong that in order to giv vent and expression to them those nativs form private associations, for instance of a charitable character, from which they strictly exclude naturalized American citizens.

Adopted American citizens, a good many of whom come so young to this country that they know nothing at all, or hardly anything, of their nativ land, are frequently called "foreigners" by their nativ fellow-citizens. But this is wrong. As soon as they hav taken the oath of citizenship, that is to say, the very moment they hav sworn, as American citizens, to support the Constitution of the United States, although they are persons of foreign birth, they cease to be "foreigners" in a political sense of the word. They, by their naturalization, become an integrant part of our American people, or nation, as freemen the peers of all their American fellow-citizens. Even an American who is politically considered as a nativ of this country may be a person of foreign birth, because at the time he was born his American parents lived abroad. Such, for instance, is the case with the children that are born to an American in a foreign land while he holds the office of American embassador, minister, or consul there.

What is the reason, if there is a just one for it, that naturalized citizens are disliked by nativ Americans? By nativ Americans I do not mean aborigines or Indians, but English-speaking people born upon American soil, are meant, who, if they are Anglo-Americans, are descendants of the English nation in Europe. Has the area of the United States been destined by "nature and nature's God"—to use the phraseology of the Declaration of Independence—to be exclusivly inhabited by descendants of the English nation, or by people speaking only the English language? While "nature and nature's God" always are just toward all mankind, such an assumption would involve the greatest injustice on their part, on account of such a one-sided preference against all other nations, except the English, which is living in the British Isles of Europe.

The American people, it is true, is an English-speaking nation. This, as an outgrowth of the history of our country, is a firmly and permanently established fact. In English our fundamental laws, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States hav been written. For these charters to the American descendants of the English nation, who were their authors and framers, full and unconditional praise is due on the part of every naturalized American citizen. In English the other laws of this country hav been given and are given by the Congress of the United States, and by the legislatures of the several states of our national union, in accordance with the charters referred to. In English the business of our American courts of justice and of our other American public offices is transacted. English, therefore, is, and for all time to come will be, the legal language of this land of the free and home of the brave, both to nativ and adopted citizens. This has been achieved by the descendants in America of the English nation in Europe. Even the common law of that nation, to a great extent, rules this free and independent country.

Yet, although the inhabitants of the United States use English as their legal language, not all of them speak it as their mother tongue. On the contrary, the American people hav a cosmopolitan character and consist of a mixture of nearly all races and nationalities on the globe, the element, however, very strongly preponderating which exclusivly speaks English.

One of the main tenets of the charters of our American freedom, is, as stated before, the principle of equal rights to all, in all matters of public concern, which was proclaimed to the world when the American people assumed the station of a nation among the other nations of the globe, on the 4th day of July, 1776. According to this principle Nativism and Knownothingism, exhibited by nativ American citizens against naturalized citizens, are wrong. Because George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, and other great men of American history, were nativ Americans it does not follow that every nativ American is a Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, or a great man of some kind. Otherwise no nativ American would ever hav to die by a hangman's rope, or be an inmate of a state prison, penitentiary, or jail, or hav become a perjured, blood-stained traitor of his country, as was the case with the leaders of the late rebellion in the United States, that involved a civil war of four years duration. The United States certainly no more than any other country produces only good and wise men. Our globe, however, is adapted to produce such men everywhere, in all countries.

The naturalized American citizen has to pay taxes and to bear all other public burdens at exactly the same ratio as his nativ American fellow-citizens. He, therefore, by a reversion of the principle, "No taxation without representation," so that it reads, "Taxation and representation," ought to enjoy all the privileges that are enjoyed by his nativ fellow-citizens, and among them the privilege not only to vote for, but also to hold, public offices of every kind. Or does our noble American principle of equal rights to all American citizens, nativ or adopted, in all matters of public concern, admit any other interpretation? Certainly not.

This principle necessarily leads to the conclusion that naturalized just as well as nativ American citizens ought to be eligible to the offices of Presidency and Vice-Presidency of the United States. But one of the provisions of the Constitution, quoted above, strictly and distinctly forbids this.

Because the idea and principle of freedom, upon which the government of the United States rests, hav no local, national, but a universal, cosmopolitan character, the constitutional clause referred to is wrong. The proscription of naturalized citizens it contains is as plain a violation of the principle of equal rights to all in all matters of public concern as negro slavery was in this country before its abolition by the thirteenth constitutional amendment. That proscription, therefore, ought to be abolished too, by a constitutional amendment. It clearly is the very root of the Nativism and Knownothingism in this free country, whose nativ and adopted citizens ought to exhibit toward each other nothing but good will, and least of all dislike and aversion on account of the difference of their nationalities. That constitutional clause grants a monopoly to natural-born Americans. But such a monopoly, because it does not agree with the principle of equal rights to all, in all matters of public concern, must necessarily engender unrepublican pride, vanity, and haughtiness in the hearts of nativ Americans. It unfortunately makes them believe that by birth they are better men than the rest of mankind, and that men hailing from foreign countries are by birth inferior human beings. This notion is not only not true but ridiculous, and in full contradiction to our Declaration of Independence. Said monopoly is wrong and demoralizing, as in fact all monopolies are. This latter truth has been clearly shown by negro slavery and its sad consequences in this country. Slavery, which was utterly incongruous with justice, liberty, and humanity, was, while it existed in the United States, nothing but a fiendish monopoly in favor of the former slave-holders.

Self-respect and love of freedom, which are identical, are not confined to the English nation or its descendants in America, but universal among mankind, dwelling in the heart of every sensible man of every nationality.

No correct principle, therefore, is contained in said constitutional proscription of naturalized citizens. The framers of the Constitution, by establishing that proscription, committed as great a blunder as they did by making negro slavery a constitutional institution. The former, it may be repeated, ought to be abolished just as well by a constitutional amendment as was the latter. Said constitutional clause, debarring naturalized citizens from the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, is hurtful to the interests of this country. It prizes nativity higher than knowledge, intellect, and character. Suppose any naturalized citizen to be better fitted to fill the presidential chair, to the credit and benefit of our American nation, than a nativ citizen. If such be the case, this free country cannot avail itself of that man's services on account of the constitutional proscription referred to. American civilization, being thus at war with itself, can certainly not march at the head of the civilization of the world. And what is to be said of the case of a man whose nativ place became, or becomes, a part of the territory of the United States after his birth? One may think of Texas and perhaps of Canada in this respect. Is he eligible to the Presidency or not? This is certainly a puzzling question. The boundary lines of the United States, as is well known, were repeatedly changed since the adoption of our American Constitution in 1787. The sooner the monopoly of nativity, contained in the constitutional clause referred to, is abolished, the more such an event will benefit our American nation. Naturalized citizens, if they are no longer proscribed by the Constitution as to the two highest public offices in the land, will, of course, be encouraged to become truer Americans, and exhibit more public spirit and less clannishness, in case they really lack any of the virtues of American citizens.

There is no danger that a repeal of the constitutional clause referred to would render the United States a polyglot country. It is apparent that no naturalized American citizen could make his appearance as a candidate for the Presidency or Vice-Presidency without having fully mastered and adopted the English language, reading, speaking, and writing it as well as his mother tongue, and without being thoroughly imbued with American principles.

His character, intelligence, and judgment, not the place of his birth or cradle, ought to entitle an American citizen—natural born or adopted—to hold any public office, the Presidency and Vice-Presidency included, in the United States.

One component part of our American nation are the Germans of this country. By this so-called German element the Germans of the United States are meant who were born in Germany and speak German as their mother tongue, but who hav become naturalized citizens. Their children, having been born in this country, are, properly speaking, no Germans, but Americans, and prove this fact by invariably preferring in their conversation English, the language of the land, to German.

The German naturalized citizens of the United States not rarely meet and experience Nativism and Knownothingism, and are frequently looked upon in a prejudiced manner by their nativ Anglo-American fellow citizens. Yet they are, on the whole, law-abiding, well-behaving, industrious, and thrifty people, who largely help to develop the resources of this country. They speak German among themselvs because it is their mother tongue and easiest to them. The German nation in Europe, from which they hav come, is no more responsible for the diversity of languages than the English nation, whose tongue is the language of this country. Moreover, the German nation from which they hav come is morally, socially, and intellectually as highly civilized and educated, and has as rich and noble a literature, as any other nation in the world. Aside from our own American nation, the English, French, and German nations of Europe stand abreast and not behind each other in the front rank of civilization.

From the above it will be seen that the Germans of this country, having received a good schooling in Germany, are as intelligent men as any other class of citizens. The majority of them are skilled mechanics or practical farmers, and abhor politics as a profession. They argue that in a free country, where the people govern themselvs, as little ruling as possible by public officers ought to be done, and the number of public offices ought to be as small as the welfare of the nation will permit. They think that the smallest private business, supporting a man and his family decently and honestly, is preferable to the highest office in the gift of the American nation.

The number of politicians among the Germans of this country is comparativly small. The chief reason for this fact, besides the one mentioned, and relating to their business pursuits, is that English, and not German, is the language of this country. Although the German naturalized citizens, as a rule, are no politicians, they are earnest citizens and take as deep an interest in the welfare of our nation as any other class of Americans.

The German language, which is so different from the English, and which they speak in social intercourse among themselvs, chiefly givs food to the Nativism or Knownothingism that is exhibited against the Germans of the United States. This is easily to be seen from such phrases as "the Dutch," or "Dutchmen," by which the Germans of this country are meant.

By the bye, this is the utterance of ignorant persons, who do not know that the word "Dutchman" means a Hollander and never a German, and that the German language is about as different from the Dutch as the latter is from the English.

By far the greater number of the Germans of the United States, after their immigration into this country, learn the English language as fast and as well as possible, which is by no means an easy task to them, particularly if they arrive as grown persons from Germany, and are no literary men.

Anglo-Americans frequently upbraid the Germans in America on account of the tastes of the latter, as to eating and drinking, acquired by them through the climate and productions of their nativ land. According to our Declaration of Independence every American has the inalienable right to pursue his personal happiness. The German naturalized citizen of this country therefore has the inalienable right to eat and drink what he chooses and pleases, provided he pays for it and does not steal it or swindle other people out of it. This unimpeachable truth has sarcastically and with irony against the Knownothings been stated by a German of the United States in the following rhymes, viz:

"Well, the German, although he goes to school,
Yet always, everywhere, remains a fool.
Why, look here, his wine or beer he quaffs it;
His distasteful sour-krout he swallows it;
His sausages and bretzels, he eats them;
As to Swiss and Limburg cheese, he likes them.
But, and that is the worst—for those things all
He pays, and mostly shuns in debt to fall."

Nativism and Knownothingism represent, it is true, only a sentiment, yet they are utterly wrong in principle.

While the English nation has given its language to the American people, other nations, by their descendants on American soil, largely contribute to the development of our social and business life.

A Letter from H. L. Green.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For the last twenty years I hav devoted myself to the Liberal cause, and I now find myself without a dollar in the world with which to support myself and family, and I am getting gray with age. I hav thoughtfully considered the matter and come to the conclusion that it is my duty to withdraw from Liberal work almost entirely and devote myself to my profession, the law. So long as I was writing for THE TRUTH SEEKER I felt somewhat justified in receiving it without paying for it, but as I shall not often find time to write for it (although I hope to occasionally) I do not feel it would be just for me longer to receive it without paying for it, and that I am not now able to do.

I leave the Liberal movement with the kindest feelings to all who are engaged in it. It will be impossible for me not to take more or less interest in the success of principles I hav so long labored for. There are many noble Liberal men and women in our ranks, but too many who profess to be Liberals do not fully appreciate their duty to the cause. As one of our most eloquent speakers once said, "the reason many people are Liberals is that they are too d—d stingy to pay pew rent." I hope there are but few such. This I know, that many of the noblest men and women to be found in this country are Freethinkers. But all do not fully realize the great work to be done. But every day is bringing more light to the world. Science is driving ignorance and superstition from the land, and although, friend Bennett, we may not see it in our day, yet the time will come when the human family will reverence truth and work for humanity in place of reverencing myth and fiction and working for an imaginary God. Although I am compelled to retire from the ranks, I wish all who remain to battle for the right great success. Yours fraternally, H. L. GREEN.

California Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since I last wrote you I hav put in two months of labor for the cause on Puget Sound, W. T., one of the most beautiful bodies of water in the world: deeply wooded as it is to the water's edge with ever-living green, it presents a picture which the poverty of my language cannot describe.

The face of the country is mountainous; beneath the surface seems to be one vast bed of coal, and above, the finest growth of timber on this continent. The trade carried on here in these products is something wonderful, and for ship-building is not surpassed on this continent.

My first stop was at Victoria, on my way to the Sound, where I gave five lectures to large and appreciativ audiences, notwithstanding the storm of snow and ice which seems to be the order of the day in the winter season. The friends are still at work at Victoria for the spread of truth, and when you are ready to receive subscriptions for the trip around the world I think the stalwarts, Messrs. Fell, Duck, Walker, and many others, will respond.

At Seattle, my next stopping-point, I gave my sixth course of lectures within the past seven years to audiences far beyond my expectations in point of number and interest manifested. I gave nine lectures here at this time, and the course closed with undiminished interest and increased audiences. I presented the claims of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I always do, and a goodly number promised to respond to the call for your proposed trip round the world, expressing satisfaction and confidence in the enterprise.

Bro. Bennett, you hav many warm friends in Seattle, among whom are Mr. and Mrs. Yesler, the pioneers of the city, to whom I owe many thanks for kindness to me and assistance in use of hall for lectures.

And also to your red-hot friends, Father Crane and Messrs. Booth, Bloomquist, Smith, Peterson brothers, and many others whose hearts are in the right place, from whom, if I mistake not, you will hav a helping hand. This is as it should be, for if there is a cause on earth which is deserving of support it is the common cause you are making against superstition and time-honored falsehoods which war against true religion and true civilization.

Then, in the language of St. Paul, I fetched a compass, and sailed for Port Townsend, the port of entry for the Sound, and also military headquarters. A newly-developed interest is the manufacture of iron from the ore which exists in great quantities near at hand. In point of location and scenery, viewed from the table-bluff which forms its background, the landscape has a charm not surpassed by any other point on this coast.

I gave four lectures here with satisfaction to myself, and, I trust, acceptably to the people of Port Townsend. THE TRUTH SEEKER has some warm friends here in F. H. Winslow, Messrs. Learned, Hastings, and others, to whom my thanks are due for kindness during my short stay.

At Olympia I received a warm reception from the friends of truth in a well-filled hall each night. My thanks are due to friends Young, Woodard, Rawson, Sabine, and others for favors received; and with a promis to return again some time in the sweet by and by I took the train for Astoria, lecturing one night at Tenino on my way.

Tenino is simply a station between Tacoma and Kalama, and the last place where any one would think of stopping to speak, as there are but six or eight houses in sight. But Tenino deserves mention in THE TRUTH SEEKER as containing a few live people, especially the telegraph operator and station-keeper, Charles Reed, and W. S. Huston, who on a previous occasion had propelled a hand-car fifteen miles to Olympia to hear me speak. On being asked by Mr. Reed if I would stop and giv a lecture at Tenino I replied, "Yes; a man who will take the trouble to go through the rain fifteen miles to hear the gospel of nature preached will get an audience together right in the woods." And sure enough he had advertised the meeting as only a live man can do and brought together about seventy people. Of course I did my best, for such faith and devotion is not met with every day, and gave me inspiration often wanting in a larger audience. Parting with these kind friends on the following morning I pursued my course with somewhat more of kindly feelings in my heart for humanity at large, and the increase of about twenty dollars to my worldly store, which under the circumstances is worthy of mention.

Reaching Astoria as by appointment, I gave six lectures of the radical order. These folks of Astoria want strong food. Politics divided our people here a little, but I trust that time will smooth the feathers down and good feeling prevail. My thanks are due to William Chauer, Mr. and Mrs. Ross, Messrs. McLaughlin, Nicholas, and others for a helping hand in my work.

I had intended to visit Oregon and other points on the upper Columbia in this trip, but the weather was such that I deferred it until the winter is over, when I hope to speak at Walla Walla and other points. To the friends down the coast let me say I will leave home on the 23d inst. to speak at San Luis Obispo, Lompoc, Santa Barbara, Buena Ventura, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, and other points, during February, March, and April.

Of the cause of Freethought and Spiritualism in California there is a healthful growth. San Francisco has been favored this winter with the ministrations of Thomas Gales Foster, well and favorably known in the East, and at the present time Mrs. Watson of Pennsylvania, the well-known and able exponent of Spiritualism is charming her audiences with the rich treasures of her head and heart.

Sacramento is quite alive this winter, notwithstanding the whole valley seems to be under water, except the city, which is protected by levees. The legislature is in full blast, but, like the ocean of muddy water which surrounds them, their deliberations are painfully slow and full of debris.

The Liberals here are favored with lectures this winter by Warren Chase, who, though his locks are blossoming for the spring-time of spirit life, has a mind richly stored with the gleanings of fifty years of toil in the cause of human liberty, and there seems to be no abatement in the power of his logic and magical effect of his earnest and rapid utterance. The highly-gifted artist and speaker, Ada Ballou, is here painting portraits, in which art she is not surpassed on this coast, and alternating with Mr. Chase in Sunday evening lectures to large and appreciativ audiences.

This is the home of Mrs. P. W. Stevens, a sister the late E. V. Wilson, whose name and labors are known in almost every state of this Union. Mrs. Stevens had not, like her brother, an opportunity in early life for an education, but was apparently left to the ministries of unseen agencies for mental development. And to my mind the attainments she has reached in the past twelve years are something like a miracle, and the evidence she is giving daily of spirit life is highly appreciated by the people of Sacramento and all who favor her with a visit.

Of San Jose, the Garden City of California, I may say peace, plenty, and a prospect for a bountiful harvest prevails.

There is nothing distinctivly Liberal going on here just now. But there is what is termed a young-people's meeting held in the California theater every Sunday at 2 P. M. with an attendance of ten or twelve hundred people. This meeting is not religious or opened with prayer; songs, recitations, and speeches with a broad scope is its order, and many good Liberal and radical thoughts find utterance in spite of the clergy who are watching lest somebody should slop over against the church. Last Sunday this meeting was addressed by our Unitarian minister and a Mr. Champian, a radical Spiritualist from Philadelphia, and myself. So you see we are not without some Liberalizing means to stir the hearts of the people.

I think, with Talmage, that the vital power of so-called religion is dead, and that only the fashionable formality of modern churchism remains, which can hardly be stirred into life by the craft of a Moody and Sankey.

Now, friend Bennett, let me say in conclusion, you are doing a good work, as I see you, through your books and THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, I believe, is the very best Freethought paper in the world as a medium of thought for the people. As to your contemplated trip around the world, I am in hearty accord. My five dollars will be ready when the time comes; besides, will do what I can to advance the interests of THE TRUTH SEEKER as one of its accredited agents for the Pacific coast.

You will find within money order for amount due you. Find also within my photograph, taken by Peterson Bros., of Seattle, late of Chicago. Maybe some of the friends in the East will like a glimpse of the most radical speaker on the coast. Hoping all things which are good for you and yours,

I am for truth, J. L. YORK.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, published in New York, comes to us in a new and handsome dress, on a better quality of paper, and filled with the fragrance of anti-sectarian impiety. It is the leading Liberal journal of America, and has a very large following of the most saintly sinners that ever made war on the "elect" of the "Lord." Its editor and proprietor, D. M. Bennett, Esq., is a man of extraordinary ability and energy; and if he is not as pious as Anthony Comstock, it is because Christian piety of that kind is an abomination in the sight of gods and men.—Jewish Times.

What Objections to Christianity?

REPLY TO MR. MAIR'S FIFTH LETTER.—CONCLUDED.

Before I pass on to the subject of miracles I will first add a few authorities touching oriental religions in addition to those already mentioned. With regard to the old idea of an immaculate conception and of a virgin giving birth to a child, I will refer to Plaisted's "Oriental History," Malcom's "History of Persia," Ranking's "History of the Moguls," and Grote's "History of Greece." In these may be found accounts of young maidens being overshadowed by gods of different names, and who showed a decided penchant for attractive young females of the human race.

Instead of Christ being the only son of a god believed to be born in humble life and in a humble place, it may be remarked that it was held of Christna of India that he was born in a cave, and of Osiris of Egypt the same. Some of the early gospels say that Jesus was born in a cave. See Fleetwood's "Life of Christ."

That the stars were interested at the birth of several of the pagan gods or demi-gods is described in many places. See Plaisted, page 87.

Jesus was by no means the first reputed son of a god at whose birth the angels of heaven, the shepherds, and wise men played a conspicuous part. Much the same was said of Christna, Mithra, Osiris, and others. When the latter was born, Colgate's "Egypt" says, "Angels flew to the scene, shepherds surrounded the cradle, and wise men came from a distance, and made him an offering of frankincense and myrrh" (page 72).

Graves says, "More than twenty gods are reported as having been crucified, and several of them, like Christ, while their bodies were reposing in the tomb, descended to hell, and after roasting there three days they cut loose and came back to earth, finally ascended to the house of many mansions, and took their seats at the right hand of the father of all the gods." That those who first narrated the story of the birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus had heard of some of these older claims there is little room for doubt. That the latter story was much a copy of the more antique myths is the most rational conclusion that can be arrived at.

A RECAPITULATION.

In the discussion of this, our first thesis, I claim to have shown the following points or propositions:

1. That the belief of gods begetting offspring is far older than Christianity.

2. That the idea of a virgin mother and child existed many centuries before Christianity was known.

3. That the crucifixion of sons of gods for the welfare of mankind was an old belief before the same claim was set up for Jesus.

4. That the belief in the miraculous birth, life, and resurrection of the sons of gods had been told thousands of times before repeated of Jesus.

5. That the belief in the trinity is many centuries older than Christianity, and is believed to have been the religious tradition of several nations.

6. That a belief in a life beyond the grave was firmly held long before Christianity was devised.

7. That the existence of gods and devils, heaven and hell, good and bad angels, were believed in long before Christianity.

8. That, in short, all the dogmas and creeds of Christianity had a previous existence in the older systems of religion.

9. That sentiments as pure, morals as elevated, were enjoined by other teachers as by Jesus; and long before he is said to have lived, the "Golden Rule," which is held to be the best sentiment ascribed to him, was taught by Buddha, Confucius, Socrates, Hillel, and others.

10. That there is no historical proof that such a person as Jesus of the Christian system ever had an existence.

11. That distinguished and unimpeachable writers and historians who lived and wrote at the period ascribed to Jesus, and soon after, though they entered minutely into a description of teachers, leaders, and prophets of a lesser caliber and of various religious sects, said not a word of Jesus or of a sect he established.

12. That the sect of Christians was not mentioned by Philo or Josephus, through they fully describe the Essenes, which was probably the sect from which the Christians had their immediate origin.

13. That as there is nothing really new in the Christian system, as the story of the parentage, birth, life, doctrines, death, and resurrection of its demi-god had been held to, as well as the object and purpose of his life and death in saving the world, is far older than the Christian system, it would seem wholly unnecessary for God to leave his residence above the clouds to come down to earth and be closely confined for nine months, to pass through the stages of gestation, infancy, childhood, and youth to manhood, to be put to a painful and ignominious death, to reveal simply to the world the same old story, the same old vagaries, that had been repeated thousands of times before.

14. That the accepted gospels of the New Testament were not written in the first century, and not till more than one hundred and fifty years after the time that Jesus is claimed to have lived, and that they were not written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, to whom they are falsely ascribed, but were compiled, fixed up, and issued in the latter part of the second century, and have no historical facts to stand upon.

I propose to adduce further proofs of some of the foregoing propositions as we advance on; and unless you call it out again, I will leave a further consideration of our first thesis.

SECOND THESIS.—MIRACLES.

Our second thesis, according to your revision, reads as follows, "Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and as truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus."

I think I shall not have much difficulty in making the truth of this proposition tolerably clear, and it would seem that but a limited amount of space will be necessary for the purpose. Every principal religious system the world has known has been attended with what were claimed to be miracles—events and occurrences wholly outside the ordinary course of nature. It has been said of almost every demi-god and founder of a new religion that he performed miracles, or that others performed them in his name.

It seems not a part of my duty in this instance to enter into a disquisition on the nature of miracles, of their character, of their improbability and impossibility, but simply to show that they were believed in and held to have been performed by other teachers and divine characters before Jesus. I will just remark, however, at the outset, that I do not believe in miracles, or that a miracle was ever performed. I understand a miracle to be an event produced by supernatural power in opposition to natural laws and causes, and contrary to the experience of mankind or the world.

I do not believe in supernatural power, or that there is anything superior to or above nature—the material and forces of the universe. I hold that every event that has ever taken place was the result of a natural cause or causes sufficient to produce it. I deny that such a thing as a supernatural cause ever existed. Nature, or the universe, comprehends and contains all powers, all forces, all causes, and hence everything that has taken place is natural.

Many things are grand and wonderful, and many phenomena, to uninformed minds, appear miraculous and supernatural. When a tornado or cyclone sweeps over the face of portions of the earth at the rate of seventy-five miles an hour, prostrating trees, dwellings, and animals, and by whirlwinds lifting rocks weighing many hundreds of pounds and conveying them considerable distances, it is very easy for appalled men and women to imagine that a supernatural power has caused it, and that a god was angry and showed his power. When a bolt of electricity leaves a black cloud surcharged with it, and rives a tall monarch of the forest, or demolishes some stately edifice in the lapse of a second of time, it is quite easy for superstitious people not informed of the powers of nature to imagine that a supernatural power has been employed, and that a god has again become angry; but when duly understood, the operation is found just as natural as the falling of an apple from a tree. Nature is replete with power and potency.

Many operations have become familiar to us now as natural occurrences that once would have been thought miraculous or supernatural results. A single century ago it would have been thought impossible by natural means, and in a moment of time, to convey intelligence, to transmit messages, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, three thousand miles across the continent, or from Europe to America under the water of the ocean, and it would hav been thought that supernatural powers must be invoked and miracles performed to effect such a result. But now we know that this is being performed every hour, and that it is just as natural as calling to a person across the street and holding conversation with him. Every event that can possibly take place is equally as natural when duly understood. Supernaturalism is only the dream and imagination of uninformed and superstitious minds. Pretended miracles hav even been related to confirm the faith of the world. Every system of religion in the past which recognized a supernatural power claimed and related miracles to sustain it. If Christianity is proved true by its miracles, so are many other systems of religion both before it and since.

Oriental religions were filled with marvels and miracles. In the Hindoo faith Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva performed thousands of miracles hardly necessary to repeat. In the incarnations of Vishnu, when he appeared in the various avatars, miracles without end were related. When he cohabited with the virgin Devanaguy, and Christna was the product, the most astounding miracles are claimed. It was asserted that Christna performed many miracles, and his entire life was in close connection with the supernatural. Zoroaster's conception, birth, and life were enveloped in miracle. His mother had a miraculous announcement respecting him before he was born or begotten. Miraculous predictions were likewise made respecting him. After he commenced his mission and went up on the holy mountain he had a miraculous interview with God, and received from him the law midst fire, thunderings, and earthquakes. The celestial element descended from heaven and set fire to the mountain itself. Many miracles are connected with his system of religion.

It was the same with the mythology of Egypt. The account of the life and death of its gods is interspersed with numerous miracles unnecessary to repeat. It is the same with the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Grecians, etc. Their religions were replete with miracles and supernatural occurrences. The Buddhists narrate great numbers of miracles connected with the conception, birth, life, and death of their great teacher and redeemer. He was begotten by a miracle, and miracles attended his birth; all through his life miracles abounded; he overcame his enemies and the power of evil in a most miraculous manner. At his death even the trees of the forest near which he breathed his last bloomed profusely with beauty and a fragrance that pervaded the country round about. To narrate the miracles that are claimed in connection with the life and doctrines of Buddha would require many pages. The same remarks will apply to the religions of the Romans, the Germans, the Druids, and the Scandinavians. They all claimed great numbers of miracles and supernatural manifestations. I can make out a long list of them if you desire it, but unless you do I will not take the space to enumerate them. All the systems of religion incontestably prove that in the matter of miracles Christianity has only been a copyist, a plagiarist, the same as with all its other features. Whether the claims of miracles possess merit or not, whether a belief in them is commendable or not, Christianity in no sense of the word can claim originality in that field; it borrowed its miracles the same as it has borrowed its immaculate conception, its virgin mother, its trinity, its angels and devils, its heaven and hell, and all its dogmas and doctrines. Confucianism is about the only great religion that has not been invested with miracles and supernaturalism. Confucius did not pretend to be the son of God; he did not pretend to have been begotten by a miracle; he did not pretend to perform supernatural feats; nor to be the author of impossible supernaturalisms. His teachings had reference only to humanity, to good conduct, and to the affairs of this life.

Judaism is made up of miracles, divine interpositions, and supernatural events and phenomena. Miracles are at a high premium all through it. Mohammedanism is another of the supernatural religions. Its prophet was called and commissioned by miraculous power. He made a very miraculous journey on horseback to the seventh heaven and back in a very short space of time. He made his escape from Mecca by miracle, he overcame his enemies in battle by miracle, and at his death astounding miracles are related.

Perhaps the age of miracles, par excellence, or the period in which they were most strongly believed, was about nineteen hundred years ago, and the claim was by no means confined to Jesus and his followers. Apollonius, of Tyana, was a remarkable character in this line. His birth was a very few years before the time ascribed to Jesus, and as he lived a hundred years, his life was much more prolonged, and quite as eventful. Though there is much more proof that he existed than of Jesus, he was a great miracle-worker as well as philosopher, teacher, traveler, and religious reformer. Philostratus wrote his life in full in the year 210 at the request of Julia Domna, wife of the Emperor Septimus Severus. The same has been translated into several languages. I will repeat a part of the miracles ascribed to him.

Before his birth the god Proteus appeared to the mother of Apollonius, and in reply to her inquiry, informed her that she should bring himself (Proteus) forth. The child was born in a meadow under a temple afterward dedicated to him. When the mother was near the time of her delivery she was miraculously warned in a dream to gather flowers in a meadow. While her maidens were gathering the flowers the mother fell asleep on the grass. While she was thus asleep the swans that were feeding in the meadow formed a chorus around her, and, clapping their wings, sung in unison, while the air was fanned as by a gentle zephyr. At this very time the remarkable child was born. A thunderbolt in the act of descending to the earth turned upward and disappeared.

As he passed from infancy into childhood he showed great signs of strength of mind and close application. His time after this was largely spent in Tarsus and Ægæ, where he received the teachings of the disciples of Plato, Aristotle, and other sages. He was a devoted follower of Pythagoras. He ate nothing that had life, and lived solely on vegetables and fruits. After the death of his parents he resolved never to marry and to preserve total silence for five years. Later he traveled to India, Babylon, Arabia, Susa, Germany, etc. While on his journeys he had visions and interviews with the dead. On Mount Caucasus he saw the very chains with which the demi-god Prometheus had been bound when he was crucified five hundred years before. When, in the company of the Brahmans, they simultaneously struck the earth with their staves, it heaved and swelled like the waves of the sea, and all standing around were elevated to the hight of two cubits above it. They danced a chorus in the air and then descended together.

The feast which the king of the Brahmans gave to Apollonius exceeded the feast which Jesus gave to the multitude when he fed them with five loaves and two fishes. Four Pythian tripods came forward of their own accord; also cup-bearers of black brass like the Ganymedes and Pelops of the Greeks. The earth strewed under them soft herbs like down. Bread, fruits, and vegetables of the season, together with many dainties used at feasts, came of themselves, each in order, and better prepared than the best cooks were capable of doing. The cup-bearers of brass mixed the wine and the water for the company and presented a small cup of it to each person present. The lame and blind were also cured, and many other miracles were performed.

On his return toward Ephesus, and while at Smyrna, intelligence was conveyed to him that a deadly plague was raging at the former city. He replied that the journey was not to be delayed; and no sooner had the words left his mouth than he and his companions were instantly conveyed to Ephesus, where he performed the great miracle of stopping the plague at once by causing the people to stone a wicked demon which caused all the mischief.

While on his travels over Greece he frequently cast out devils. At Athens a youth was possessed of a devil which raved and swore fearfully, giving utterance to the most horrid expressions, and swearing that he would not leave the youth. Apollonius rebuked the devil and ordered him to get out of the young man, and at the same time commanded the devil to give a visible sign. The evil being pointed to a statue standing before the royal portico and said, "I will make that statue tremble," whereupon it soon began to shake, and fell over on the ground.

Apollonius also attended a wedding and performed a wonderful miracle there. He had a disciple by the name of Menippius, who was in love with a beautiful and intelligent woman, whom he was soon to marry. When the nuptials were about to be celebrated Apollonius announced that the woman was one of the Empusæ, who passed under the names of Lamiæ and Larvæ. As soon as he made this announcement everything in the room vanished—the gold and silver vessels, cup-bearers, cooks, and all the domestic apparatus. The phantom then appeared as if in tears, and begged not to be tormented nor forced to make a confession. But Apollonius was peremptory, and the phantom confessed to being Empusæ, and that she had pampered Menippius with rich dainties for the express purpose of devouring him. Thus the disciple was miraculously saved.

After traveling all over Greece he journeyed to Rome. Here he was charged with treason, and was about to be arrested. An official approached with a roll of parchment in his hand, on which the charge was written. His disciples took alarm at the threatening aspect of affairs and fled in every direction; but Apollonius was all right; he simply stretched out his hand, and when the roll was offered not a line or word was to be found upon it.

Soon after this he met a funeral procession bearing a young woman to her grave. She was of a consular family, and all Rome condoled with the young husband of the dead woman. Appollonius addressed himself to the procession, saying, "Set down the bier, and I will dry up the tears which you are shedding for the maid." He touched the young woman, and uttered a few words over her in a low tone of voice, and she awoke from death. This feat was equal to that performed by Jesus upon another young woman in a similar condition. Which was the greater miracle of the two is an open question.

He traversed Spain and Africa, returning to Sicily and Italy, performing good deeds and working miracles on his way. At Alexandria he met Vespasian, who was on his way from Rome to Jerusalem. One day a tame lion approached him and paid him high respect. Apollonius informed those standing near that the lion wished him to inform them by what human soul he was inhabited. He then said it was the soul of Amasis, one of the ancient kings of Egypt. The moment the lion heard these words he roared in a piteous strain, crouching on his knees and bursting into tears. The lion was then dressed in colors and garlands, and sent into the interior parts of Egypt, accompanied all the way with the sound of flutes and the singing of hymns.

On a visit to Ethiopia he met with the Gymnosophists, on which occasion a miracle was performed. Thespesion, the leader of the Gymnosophists, seeing Apollonius approach, commanded a tall elm tree under which they were reposing to salute the newcomer. Immediately the tree saluted him in a very respectful manner, and spoke to him in the voice of a woman, which was easily understood.

Later he took up his residence in Syria, and spent his time in teaching the people and in doing good. When Domitian succeeded to the imperial throne of Rome, and heard of some expressions of Apollonius that did not please him, he cited Apollonius to appear before him; but Apollonius received by supernatural means the intelligence before it reached him in a natural way, and he started at once for Rome. Upon arriving there he was at once taken before the emperor, who accused him severely with being an enchanter, and ordered him to prison. Upon being again brought before the emperor, he replied to the same with so much boldness that the emperor ordered his hair and beard to be cut off, and him to be taken to prison again, loaded with chains, and cast among the vilest felons. By this time he was nearly a hundred years old. When one of his fellow-prisoners asked him when he would be set at liberty, he replied, "If it depends on the judge, to-morrow; this instant if it depends upon myself." Saying this he at once freed his limbs from his fetters, saying, "You see the liberty I enjoy." He then put on the fetters again. After being once more taken before the emperor he eluded the power of the tyrant, became invisible, and by supernatural means caused himself to be instantly transported to Puteoli, three days' journey away, where he presented himself bodily to his friends Demetrius, the philosopher, and Damis.

After this he again traveled through Greece, and spent his time in teaching the large crowds that gathered to hear him. When Domitian was being assassinated Apollonius was apprised of it at the moment, and became so absorbed in what was going on hundreds of miles away that he became nearly unconscious of what was taking place around him. His thoughts and words were taken up with what was transpiring at Rome, and among his utterances he cried, "Strike the tyrant; strike!" A few minutes later he said, "The deed is done;" and it proved upon investigation that he was exactly right in time. This remarkable instance of supernatural power of vision is given by Philostratus, and Dion Cassius as well, and they agree far better than do the gospel writers as to many incidents in the asserted career of Jesus.

When Nerva assumed rule in Rome he sent to Apollonius to come and consult with him, but the message returned was characteristic of the remarkable man: "We will converse together, O Emperor, during a long time, when we will neither command others, nor will others command us;" implying, of course, that they would both soon leave this world and meet in the other. They both soon after died. This was nearly equal to "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

There is discrepancy as to when Apollonius departed this life. Some say he died at Ephesus; some that the exit was made at the temple of Dictyma in Crete, and others that it was in the temple of Minerva at Lindus. This disagreement in the accounts of his death is not unlike the contradictory statements about the close of Jesus' career on earth. The writers of the canonical gospels disagree in many particulars as to the reply that Jesus made to Pilate; as to the number of times the cock crew—Mark says once, the others three times; the inscription on the cross is differently stated by all; they differ as to when the crucifixion took place; Luke says it was Calvary, while the others say it was Golgotha; Matthew and Mark differ as to the color of the robe Jesus wore, one saying scarlet, while the other insists upon purple. They agree no better as to what was given Jesus to drink. Matthew says gall mingled with vinegar; Mark, wine mingled with myrrh; Luke, vinegar straight; John, vinegar and hyssop. The hour of the crucifixion is as diversely stated. Matthew says the ninth, Mark the third, Luke the ninth, John the sixth. John says Joseph begged the body "secretly," Mark says "boldly." Matthew says it was Mary Magdalene and the other Mary who first visited the sepulcher; Mark says it was Mary the mother of James and Saloma; Luke says it was Joanna and Mary, while John says it was Mary Magdalene alone. They differ as to how the stone was rolled away and as to the number of angels seen there, and the positions they were seen in. They show the same amount of inharmony of statement as to whom Jesus appeared to. Matthew says to two women, Mark one woman, Luke two apostles, John one woman, while Paul has it Cephas. In the announcement that Jesus had been seen, and how, no two of them agreed. They disagreed widely as to the persons Jesus appeared to after his resurrection and the number of times. Matthew says twice, first at the sepulcher, and later to the eleven in Galilee; Mark says three, first to Mary Magdalene, next to two disciples, and to all the disciples at meat; Luke says three times, John four times, and Paul six times, to Peter, to the twelve, to more than five hundred, to James, to all the apostles, to Paul himself. The ascension is very differently stated. Matthew did not deem it a matter of sufficient consequence to mention it at all; Mark turns it off with these few words, "So, then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand side of God." Luke says Jesus led his disciples out as far as Bethany, lifted up his hands, and then was carried up. John deemed the matter of such trifling importance that he had not a word to cay about it. Possibly the committee who for some ten years have been revising this word of God have corrected all these contradictions.

After the death of Apollonius he appeared to some of his disciples at Tyana and convinced a young man of the reality of life after death. He was worshiped some centuries as a god. One or more temples were erected to him, and the Emperor Alexander Severus had a statue made of him, which he kept in his private closet where he worshiped. Many writers spoke very highly of him as a god or as a very wise man. Ennapius said he was something between a god and a man. Had the Christians only adopted him instead of Jesus, it is difficult to see why he would not have made just as good a redeemer as the latter. He certainly lived much longer, taught much more extensively, and performed miracles just as wonderful. There is far more proof that he had a real existence than that Jesus had, he is not nearly so much a mythical character, and it is hard to see why his life, morals, and teachings were not equally as good. This may possibly shock you who have so high a veneration for Jesus as a god; but your feeling him is much like that of the adorers of Christna for that god, like the Persians for Zoroaster, the Buddhists for Buddha, the Mussulmans for Mohammed, the Shakers for Ann Lee, and the Mormons for Joseph Smith. Had you been reared in either of those religions your veneration would be as great for the teachers named as it now is for Jesus. I consider myself quite impartial, and able to look fairly upon all, seeing no special amount of deity in either.

Other great miracle-workers have lived at different times. Simon Magus was one. He lived in the same century assigned to Jesus and Apollonius. The miracle business flourished greatly at that period. Simon Magus succeeded so well with his miracle-working that his Christian opponents accused him of being helped by the devil. They have ever since been equally unfair and severe upon competitors, whom they either accuse of being co-workers with the devil or send to him after death. Among the miracles performed by Simon Magus, or in his presence, may be mentioned the following: When he was on one occasion being whipped by his enemies, he caused the rods to pass through his body as though it had been smoke, and it is to be hoped that they hurt him no more than if it had been smoke. He caused stone statues to move like living persons. He animated lifeless things. He converted stones into bread. He flew through the air from one mountain to another, and from one place to another, alighting on the earth gently and safely. When brought before Nero he assumed different forms and shapes; he became a small child, then an old man, and again a young man, changing both his face and body. He raised a dead man to life. He called angels to his assistance. He changed himself into a ram, and when in that condition his head was taken off, and on the third day he rose from the dead. Finally he built a town by supernatural power to please Nero, and from it flew through the air like a bird; but Peter, being his enemy, prayed that he might fall, when poor Simon fell to the earth and was dashed to pieces.

I could fill many pages with the miracles said to hav been performed by various persons, but it is hardly worth while. I have already shown what I undertook to show that many both before and since Jesus, are said to have performed miracles and supernatural deeds equally as remarkable and impossible as are accredited to him, and these claims of miracle-working are even now set up in our own times. Of course I do not believe that these miracles were ever performed but the accounts are just as reliable and trustworthy as about the miracles performed by Jesus, and I can believe them just as easily. Every claim set up that miracles have been performed by any one is in my opinion utterly and entirely false. Nature does not do violence to herself; and God, if there is a God, does not violate his own fixed laws.

In closing this lengthy reply in which I fear I have occupied more space than even you did, let me suggest that hereafter we make our articles briefer, and not undertake to cover so much ground at one time. This course will undoubtedly be less tiresome to our readers. Sincerely yours,

D. M. B.

I HAV obtained more information about the leading Freethinkers of our own and olden times from "The World's Sages" than I supposed could be sold for $3. T. G.

"NATHANIEL VAUGHAN" is a magnificent novel. Its radical character and the ability of its author rank it with George Eliot's works.—From a review.

Ways and Means.

AN APPEAL FOR THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

The old theologic creeds of the world hav, from time immemorial, organized their adherents and propagated their faiths by activ corporations and through aggressiv combinations of men. These religious organizations hav borne sway over humanity now for many thousands of years—the most modern and persistent of them commencing nearly two thousand years ago.

THE POWER OF ORGANIZATION.

Meantime, however, science has advanced; some nearer approach to the true origin of things has been discovered; clearer cosmical conceptions prevail, and more practical theories of the conduct of life actuate the minds of men. As the falsity of old creeds has been shown, counter organizations for spreading light and announcing the truth on all subjects hav sprung into activity. Organization has built up the great pyramids of fraud, and organization must pull them down. After the fall thereof, organization must clear also the ground, and build up the new and the true. There is no other name given under heaven by which the organized cohorts of error can be vanquished and replaced by cohorts of the good and true but by opposit and just as aggressivly persistent organization. The churches to-day, with their faiths demonstrated as falsities, their creeds as cruelties, and their liturgies as lies, are yet by their organization able to keep the field and maintain the start they hav gained on the whole intelligent world. By their organization they contrive yet to giv color to legislation, to deprive society of one-seventh part of its time, to prohibit innocent amusements or dictate their form, to tax the property of others and exempt their own, to levy assessments on birth, death, and marriage, to impose so-called moral obligations on their laity and exempt the clergy, to extort secrets from the ignorant whom they are able to frighten to the confessional, and, generally, to reverse nature, turn innocent acts into sins, and make obedience to natural law a crime.

Without organization on the part of freemen they would be, indeed, they are, wholly at the mercy of the organized believers in lies. Look at this statement sent me by a correspondent: A village of 1,000 inhabitants, five churches, forty-five members in them altogether, hundreds of Freethinkers in the place, and yet these five churches, with only forty-five members in the whole or them, rule that town. The churches are organized, the free citizens are not.

Suppose you are a farmer, and hav plenty of cabbage and potatoes, and are at liberty to sit down and eat them, what is such a vegetable existence worth if you cannot hav mental freedom? What is it worth if you want a certain book from New York, and you send an order to the publisher accompanied by the money, and he can't send it to you without asking permission of the church who rules the state? And what makes it still more galling is that the church is at liberty to send her publications uninspected and unopposed, no matter how obscene they may be; and the Christian farmer can sit down and eat his cabbage and potatoes, and order what books he pleases, and hav them sent to him without question.

If a play, even of their own pious kind, which they take a notion not to like, is proposed at a theater, they, by their organization, bear down on the press and public opinion and squelch it; while we, in our disorganization, hav but to submit. If a World's Fair is organized, and Congressional aid asked, they get it, and then the great organized church dictates that the Fair shall not be open on Sunday. They hav taken our money through taxation, and then prescribe the time, wherein we are most at leisure, when we shall not attend. These are two out of many examples of what the organized can bring to bear against no matter how large numbers of the unorganized. It is just like the power of one organized regiment against a 100,000 unorganized mob. Let the Liberals of this country organize, then they will exert their fair share of influence in the government, politics, amusements, industries, and social institutions of this country, and make their power respected. That is what the Liberal League wishes to do, and will do, if it is once aided to get a good start.

The following items are taken from one number of the New York daily Times:

"Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick has given in all to the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Chicago the sum of $200,000."

"Of the $370,000 required for the endowment of the new Angelican Bishopric of Southwell, $250,000 has been subscribed."

"The gifts already made by Mrs. Valeria G. Stone, of Boston, out of the estate left by her husband, to aid and endow colleges and seminaries in this country and in missionary fields, amount to more than $800,000, besides $700,000 to churches, relativs, and friends, and various objects of charity."

Will there never be such munificent donors to the cause of Freethought? No, never—till the cause of Freethought is ORGANIZED—till it has a living, activ body through which the soul of it can manifest itself. Pious people giv to established, well-accredited organizations. Liberal people would giv freely for the promotion of mental freedom if an organization existed powerful enough to promote it. There is but one Stephen Girard in the first half of this century and one James Lick in the last, because there has been no Liberal organization prominent and powerful enough to attract the attention and command the confidence of Freethinking wealthy men and women.

The National Liberal League, though only four years old, will endeavor to grow and persist and supply the needed demand.

Very few, even of thinkers, hav yet begun to realize the importance of organtzation, the power of association, the value of coöperation, and union of forces. Two woodsmen with handspikes pry up a log; that is a unit or first step in organization, to join forces to do what one could not do—what one has not the force to do. Three put their shoulders to the wheel—that is more organization. Ten capitalists join pockets and brains to build and run a railroad. One alone has neither pocket nor brains enough to do it. These are samples of material organization, which, as they increase in their organized numbers, are endowed with tremendous power. One infallible pope divides up the whole world into sees and dioceses, episcopates and arch-episcopates, bishoprics and archbishoprics, and appoints a long hierarchal line of priests, vicars, bishops, archbishops, and cardinals up to the papal throne itself. This is spiritual assumption organized upon a ground of material support; but it is an organization of prodigious power and far-reaching consequences.

On the contrary, observe now the few Freethinkers in a town—say ten of them—seen perhaps about the stores and groceries, talking Liberalism and complaining of the ostracism they meet and the snubs they get from the pietists who are in power. Unorganized as they are, nobody fears them at all—nobody even respects them—they are the social and intellectual outcasts of the place. But let these ten men get together, appoint a chairman, secretary, and treasurer, assemble weekly, and begin to talk over church taxation and the expense to themselvs of other folks' religion, and how to put a stop to church aggressions, Sunday laws, religious exercises in the schools which their children attend—do this, and the church takes immediate alarm, and the ten Freethinkers are lifted into immediate consideration and respect. Loose talk on the street corners is cheap, but organizing to talk is another matter. That means business, and talk may then result in action. Still more are the churches scared, and begin to flutter and agitate among themselvs as to what they must do about it when these ten men annually, say in the spring, send a delegate to a state convention, and again in the fall send more delegates to a national convention. Then they snuff something in the wind, and want to know what is up. From that time on these groups of ten begin to grow, extend their influence, and become centers of discussion, agitation, education, and a healthy public opinion.

LIBERAL ORGANIZATION BEGUN.

At the commencement of the second century of this republic the Liberals of this country set about founding such an organization on a national scale for the purpose of remedying this state of subjugation in which they find themselvs placed. They said, "It is not in our stars, but in ourselvs that we are underlings," and we will organize a revolt. Accordingly, on the 4th of July, 1876, a representativ body of them assembled at Philadelphia and organized the National Liberal League. That institution has grown and flourished ever since. At its first annual congress in 1877 it had eighteen local auxiliary Leagues; at its second, in 1878, it had sixty-two; at its third, in 1879, deducting eight that had withdrawn, it had 113; at its last congress, in Chicago, September, 1880, it had 201 affiliated, undetached auxiliaries, an average of more than doubling its growth every year since its foundation. Since September three auxiliaries hav withdrawn and eight new ones hav joined, leaving a balance of 206 still loyally attached.

As a matter of course, such an organization must meet with difficulties. It has met with them. Not well accustomed to methods of organization, the Liberals hav had to experiment. They hav had everything to learn. The League expected to be encompassed about with enemies, and has been in some degree prepared to meet them. It did not expect foes in its own household; but it has had them too, and has discomfited them. This it has regretted, but it knew that "when an omelet is to be made, some eggs hav to be broken." He who is not for us is against us; and opponents, friendly or other, must get out of the way. The League is now in good, compact, fighting trim, and prepared to go industriously, courageously forward with its work; and its work is just as important now as on the day it was organized.

SINEWS OF WAR.

But at this stage of its progress the National League needs a sounder financial basis. It is organized not for display, not for merely ornamental purposes, but to work; and to work effectually it must hav the tools. The needful is necessary. Money is oil. Here we hav the machinery—engin, boiler, wheels, cogs, gudgeon, bearings, and plenty of steam, but lacking oil to lubricate with. Of course the thing creaks and squeaks and heats its journals.

Hitherto the National League has pursued the most economical methods. It has grown itself by the inherent weight of its opinions and the merit of its measures. It has had no adventitious aid from money. It has never been puffed nor advertised; on the contrary, it has been traduced and vilified. It has been the subject of sneers from the Rev. Joseph Cook because one year it reported only $200 in its treasury. But it survives and livs on, spite of positiv obloquy or negativ notoriety.

The League has relied wholly on the devotion of its adherents for the personal service necessary to carry it forward. It has no salaried officers. It never has paid a dollar of rent for office rooms. Its revenues hav been small, but its expenditures hav been kept small to meet them.

This limited enterprise, however, cannot always continue. There is a saving which tendeth to poverty, and the League must not continue that stage of poor economy. As the League grows the work of it increases. But the value of its influence and enterprise also increases. Its correspondence alone is already too heavy for one secretary. It needs activ agents, from now on, to enlarge its work, agents giving their whole time for fair compensation. The League Constitution provides for a state committee in every state. The chairmen of these state committees are appointed annually by the League Congress. Vacancies are filled by the board of directors. The chairman of each state committee ought to be the best Liberal in the state for which he is appointed. There is work enough to take up his whole time, and he ought to be paid. Then these state chairmen make up a national committee, who hav to be directed by a national chairman. He ought to be a born organizer, and should be the busiest man alive. As no man can work, year in and year out, for no compensation, he must be paid. With a state committee man busily at work in every state, and their national chairman energetically and intelligently directing them, the orthodox fur would begin to fly in this country.

The following are some of the duties that would devolve on these state committee men: They would make it their business to get up town meetings, county meetings, state conventions, and always to organize auxiliary Leagues when possible. They would look after the circulation of Liberal journals and general Liberal literature, and everywhere set the people to reading. They would scatter petitions for the taxation of church property; agitate for the removal of the Bible from the public schools; interview teachers; stir up public opinion against exploded doctrins and dogmas that get interpolated into school books; get the Sunday laws discussed and push for their repeal; attend political conventions; get Liberal principles incorporated into the platforms of any and all parties; question candidates; contribute articles to the state and local press; in short, each one would be the very activ, never-tiring Liberal scout and and representativ in every state, keeping it stirred up, and doing all manner of Liberal work as opportunity for it arises. All this would go on under the direction of the national chairman of the executiv committee, and he under the advice and coöperation of the board of directors, of whom he is one.

But the Liberal League makes no war on religion as such, nor on Christianity as a form of religion. The League wishes only to eliminate those spiritual intangibilities, but in practice very painful realities, from any influence or control in the state, and from undue influence over public opinion. Take religious creeds entirely out of the state, let their kingdom be really not of this world, let the subjects of the state be simply treated in law, in legislation, and before the courts as equal citizens, without any reference to church or religious faith, and this League would hav no further reason for being. If the church can secure observance of the Sabbath, on her terms and in her way, on the part of any number of people by fairly reasoning with them and persuading them by the facts of science, all well. But when she resorts to force, invades the state and procures the passage of laws, dictating how other men, not devotees of hers, shall or shall not spend any portion of their time, she gets out of her sphere. The League, then, has a reason for being, and will endeavor to limit her to her rightful kingdom.

Also when she imposes her theological books, doctrins, and observances upon the public schools, attended by children of all religious faiths as well as of none, she is equally out of her rightful place and must be relegated back to where she belongs. Also, if religion is a grace and a luxury—and she takes luxurious and expensiv houses to enjoy it in—she must pay her own taxes on those houses and stand all other costs of enjoying it. But within her own sphere the League will never disturb her—or at least in no other way than as League principles, like the sun, shine on all alike and convince on account of their reasonableness, just as the general facts of science do.

The Deepening Conflict.

Ideas are never at rest. They drive us on whether we will or no. Luther started the Reformation, but he was afraid of it after a while and wished that he had remained within the bosom of the church. He did not realize that his thesis would carry him or the world so far along. So to-day many who entered upon Liberalism with eager hope would fain stop its course, for it seems to be taking on a too fierce and revolutionary aspect.

They want Liberalism to settle into a comfortable night-cap order and dream the happy hours away.

They want no more fighting. Having made a Sabbath day's journey in reform they are ready for a good night's sleep.

But the army is in motion, and they who will not advance must become a part of the lumbering and useless baggage.

We may desire peace but we cannot hav it. We may wish to wander in the green pastures and lie down by the still waters, but if we hav a particle of conscience the thunders of battle still call.

The irrepressible conflict and antagonism of the old with the new is seen in the recent action of a committee of a Unitarian church. They hav decided that an honest and devout thinker, with high and noble views of morality and religion, has no legal claim within their body.

If he stays he stays on courtesy and is put on starvation rations.

Time was when Unitarianism was in the front rank of the Liberal world, but now it is side by side with orthodoxy. This may be a bad outlook for Unitarians, but it is a good sign for the world. It shows that things are growing. Unitarianism, with all its outside light and sweetness, is after all at its heart bitterly sectarian.

It is fundamentally supernaturalism, and hence when the issue comes it stabs at the heart of liberty. Unitarianism is now only a landmark of human progress. It is not, as it once was, a spirit and a life.

The old fogy can dwell in its shadowy comfort, but the fresh and earnest man has no place in its luxuriant apathy. In the deepening conflict it has passed by on the other side. It no longer helps the beleaguered world. It is the priest and Levite.

Another sign that the battle is by no means over is the refusal of the Massachusetts legislature to giv Atheists the right to testify in a court of justice. It seems impossible that in this enlightened age, in the very heart of our civilization, so barbaric a refusal could be made.

It shows the deep hold of ignorance and superstition upon the minds of men, and that in the shadow of Harvard College the ghosts are still worshiped as if Huxley and Darwin had made no discoveries.

Such things, however, should not make us despair of the race, but nerve us to greater effort. The deadly opposition we find should only make us bold and enthusiastic. We must be ready to battle with the old and at the same time welcome the new in every form. We must not be frightened by the bugbears of the past nor by the strange appearances of the future.

The conflict deepens. Is reaches from land to land. The forces against us are subtle and terrible, and as we change front old allies become enemies. Some issues touch their latent orthodoxy, and they turn and rend us. This cannot be helped. It only shows the vastness and grandeur of the interests involved, and that we are all building better than we know. S. P. PUTNAM.

Enterprise.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

When last I wrote you, soon after the Paine celebration in this town, I stated that we were soon to start for the West, and I supposed I was writing you the truth, for indeed we thought to hav reached Denver or San Francisco as early as April or May. A change has been made in our program. Our Western trip is indefinitly postponed.

When we came to Linesville we had no idea of remaining more than about ten days, but so great was the demand here and in the surrounding country that we went immediately to work and hav been as busy as bees ever since, in many instances holding meeting nearly every night during the week, and three times on Sunday. And now what do you think? Why, the Liberals of Linesville and other places hav arranged for us to remain with them one year, giving Linesville one quarter of the time, and dividing the balance in surrounding towns. Our friends will be no more surprised to read this than we are to record it, for it is something of which we had never thought until a few days since. Alas for the plans of mice and men!

Since my last correspondence we hav held meetings one Sunday in Linesville, two Sundays and three week evenings in Andover, O., two evenings in Hartstown, Penn., and one evening in Meadville and one in Conneant Center; besides, Moses has held a four-day's discussion in Jamestown, Penn., with Elder Clark Braden, a Disciple minister.

Hartstown is one of the most superstitious and benighted places in this region. Our meetings were the first Liberal meetings ever held in the place. We were invited and entertained by Hugh F. Blair. He and his family are the only Liberals in town. Mr. Blair is one of the few men who hav backbone enough to stand up independently in the face of a whole community and assert his honest opinions. The discussion in Jamestown was largely attended, and must prove an eye-opener to many of its citizens. Moses will probably debate with Mr. Braden in Andover in the course of a couple of weeks.

So the cause moves on. Would it not be well if the Liberalists all over the country would emulate the example of those in western Pensylvania and eastern Ohio, unite in their endeavors, and strive with all their might for the furtherance of those principles that will emancipate the human mind from superstition and ignorance?

Inclosed please find a subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Put us down for your book "Around the World." We are scattering Freethought literature wherever we go, and doing all in our power to remove the scales from blinded eyes.

Hoping that we may be able to send you good reports from time to time, and that THE TRUTH SEEKER and its contemporaries may prosper, I am

Fraternally, MATTIE E. HULL.

Book Notice.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

It seems unnecessary, at this late hour in the day, after so many abler pens hav eulogized "An Infidel Abroad," for me to add my feeble testimony (as the class and prayer-meeting Christians repeat), yet, nevertheless, I feel that I should be lacking in justice and duty did I permit the book to pass unnoticed.

Truth, "the New York penny daily," sneeringly so called by some of its would-be rivals, has most faithfully reviewed the book, as hav many other literary critics and scholars, to say nothing of the kind words of admiration and gratitude bestowed by scores of the friends of its author; therefore Mr. Bennett is not only the hero of Ludlow and Albany, but has become the hero of "An Infidel Abroad." A perusal of his travels makes me feel I too would like to view those scenes and behold what Mr. Bennett must necessarily leave undescribed. So much in so little awakens astonishment at its density, while the labor and care in transcribing and transmitting excites the curiosity to inquire if the indefatigable author ate, drank, or slept during his ten weeks' absence, or whether he employed a score of amanuenses to enlarge upon his thoughts as he briefly jotted them down. None but a worker could see and write so much. A trip around the world might be very pleasant and beneficial to him and vastly useful to those who are compelled to remain at home, but just now some of his friends feel as if he could not be spared from his work here, among whom are Mr. and Mrs. Aspinwall, of Loudonville, N. Y., the latter of whom expressed herself something like this when I met them in Albany, "I think uncle Bennett had better remain in New York and defer his trip around the world till some future time." So say I.

Yours truly, ELLA E. GIBSON.

Spiritual and Liberal Convention.

The Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists will hold their annual convention at Flint, Genesee county, Mich., commencing on Wednesday, March 23d, at 2 o'clock P. M., and closing Monday, March 28th. First three days of meeting will be at Spiritualists' Hall, City Hall building, Main street; Saturday and Sunday at Fenton Hall, Saginaw street. All speakers in the state and adjoining states are invited. Also all mediums and all interested in the cause. There will be no printed program for speeches. The board will arrange for lectures, and each evening announce the program for the following day. Good music will be in attendance.

Thursday—General business, reading of secretary's and treasurer's reports, and reports of all committees present.

Friday—Mediums' day, devoted exclusivly to mediums and their interests.

Saturday—Election of officers at 2 o'clock P.M., followed by report of camp-ground committee.

Sunday—Celebration of the anniversary of modern Spiritualism.

Speakers will be entertained free of charge, and every arrangement made for the entertainment of all friends from abroad. There will be ample accomodations for all.

Rates at hotels will be as follows: Hotel Bryant, $1.25 per day; Sherman House, $1.00; Dayton, $1.00; Washington House, 25 cents per meal.

Reduced rates hav been secured on the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railroad. Two cents per mile each way from all stations between Port Huron and South Bend. Tickets good from March 22d to 29th inclusiv.

Flint and Pere Marquette Railroad rates, one fare and one-third for the round trip to those presenting certificates.

Detroit, Grand Haven, and Milwaukee Railroad, two cents per mile each way from all stations to those presenting certificates.

N. B.—Persons going over the F. and P. M. and D. G. H. and M. railroads are requested to present certificates to secure reduced rates. Said certificates will be furnished on application to the Secretary, Miss J. R. Lane, 312 Woodward avenue, Detroit, Mich. All persons sending for certificates must inclose three-cent stamp for return postage. Parties are requested to go from depot to Spiritualists' Hall, City Hall building, Main street, where the reception committee will meet them and see that all are provided for. Come one and all and let us labor together for the advancement of truth and Freethought. Membership certificates one dollar a year as heretofore.

Augustus Day, of Detroit, will be in attendance with a large and well-selected stock of Spiritual and Liberal books, which he will sell at publishers' prices, and will also take subscribers for all Spiritual and Liberal papers.

LOCAL RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

W. R. ALGER, A. CROSBY.
Mr. and Mrs. T. WOLCOTT, Mr. and Mrs. S. C. ALLEN, Mrs. HARRISON PARKER.

L. S. BURDICK, President,
MISS J. R. LANE, Secretary, Box B, Kalamazoo.
312 Woodward ave., Detroit.

A Suggestion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I see it stated that no law exists in the District of Columbia to punish the father of illegitimate children, and that Congress appropriates large sums each year to sustain asylums and lying-in hospitals for the care of unfortunate mothers who are the victims of licentious fathers; also that at these hospitals and asylums there are allowed a flock of chaplains and licentiate preachers to do the praying for the institutions, who get their "board free" for their valuable and pious services. Referring to the almost daily record of the newspapers of the day of the licentious practices, seductions, and dalliances with the ewe lambs of their flocks by the priesthood of all the different churches, is it not very evident if there were less "acting chaplains and licentiate preachers" who get their "board for their services" connected with these government institutions that there would be far less illegitimate children and ruined women to be cared for by public appropriation? W. S. W.

Colonel Ingersoll.

[The following very sensible remarks are from the editorial columns of the Brooklyn Eagle. It is certainly a sign of improvement in the world for a prominent daily to speak out in this fearless manner:]

The Eagle of yesterday (Sunday) contained an exceedingly breezy interview with Col. Ingersoll concerning the Delaware judge who desired to hav him indicted for blasphemy. It is, we take it, clear to most men that grand juries are not designed to answer the arguments of Infidels, and that Christianity is not very largely indebted to the persons who hav from time to time made the common jail auxiliary to the pulpit. We may be reasonably sure that the doctrin of the trinity has not been popularized in the least by being taken under the special protection of persons who hav eked out their limping logic with writs of incarceration against disbelievers. So far as the offense called blasphemy is concerned, it is too vague to be defined by statute, and has no meaning except that certain zealots hav, from time to time, made it criminal to dissent from their opinions. It is certainly a piece of intolerable assumption for any man to take it upon himself to deal out punishment in behalf of the deity. The infinit being will, we may be sure, find the means of protecting himself without the assistance of conceited bigotry. There is only one phase of blasphemy with which we can hav any common concern in American society; that is when a breach of good manners is committed. Coarse expressions fall under the taboo which applies to all foul language, and against those who use it society can defend itself by ostracizing them. In this no penal statute can help in the least. The defense is in the living sense of decency. If the truth were told we should probably find that men like Col. Ingersoll would not be much complained of by the unco guid if they were coarse fellows who gave offense to cultivated ears. The charge of blasphemy is pressed not because they are coarse but because they are captivating. It is worthy of note in this relation that the Colonel is exceedingly strong in point of character. It is a familiar mode of answering Infidel arguments to asperse the character of the Infidels; to assert that they disbelieve because they covet the license which disbelief givs. The foul attacks made upon Tom Paine hav this and no other significance. In the Colonel's case this style of debate won't do, for he happens to be a gentleman of exemplary life.

Of course, no cultivated mind will commit the blunder of identifying the merits of Christianity with the conceited ignorance and driveling intolerance of some of its self-constituted guardians. A cause which can point to the faith of nearly two thousand years, in whose list of disciples are to be found poets, philosophers, historians, and the chief men of science, does not need the jailer as an advocate.

In so far as the ardor of Col. Ingersoll is concerned, it is to be said that he appears as anxious to deprive ordinary mortals of the comfort which they find in their faith as any of the martyrs were to die for it. The whole significance of Christianity can hardly be understood by a gentleman who has a large income, troops of friends, a keen relish for all the fine things of this life, and more than his share of the fat things of the earth. What charm has Atheism for the hungry, the naked, the friendless, the oppressed?

Letters from Friends.

DODD CITY, TEXAS, Feb. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for the benefit of your contemplated world circumnavigation. I hope you will not desist from this Herculean tour. I think if your health and finances are sufficient, you should go by all means. I see a great many write you to "count" them and put them down for $5, etc. Why don't they remit the money to you at once. I don't hesitate to do so, and trust in your honesty to refund the money in case you don't go. Your character and actions are before the world.

Respectfully, B. L. ROYCE.

OXFORD, N. Y., March 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I want you to add my name to the list for your trip round the world. Will send you $5.00 when you think you hav enough names to warrant you in the undertaking. I hav read your letters of travel in Europe. I consider them just grand.

Yours truly, CHAS. BENNETT.

ANGELICA, N. Y., March 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Count on me for $5.00 for your proposed trip around the world.

Yours, etc., J. T. BROWN.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Feb. 19, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: am glad that you returned in good health from your European trip, and even my family enjoy your recital of the journey although they do not like your sentiments in other respects.

Whenever you decide to make the trip round the world I shall contribute my share.

Yours respectfully, HENRY FUCHS.

ST. HELENA, NEB., March 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Put my name down on your list for $5.00 to send you around the world on your terms offered. It will be forthcoming at the first notice.

Respectfully yours, HENRY FELBER.

BART, PA., March 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: If you conclude to make a trip around the world count me in for five dollars, to be paid when called for. I should be pleased to hav the facts in regard to the missionary business among the poor benighted heathen. I should judge you are the right man to giv such facts. J. M. KING.

CLEBURNE, TEXAS, Feb. 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Put me down for $5, to be paid any time, for the trip around the world, and so soon as the time to start comes around I will get you at least a half dozen trial subscribers, and by the time you get back I think they will hav their eyes open so they will be regular subscribers. M. M. HAGLER.

WOODSTOCK, VT., Feb. 12, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I do not wish to eulogize myself, but seeing the subject of Materialism and Spiritualism so warmly advocated in your paper leads me back to the position I occupied when Abner Kneeland was imprisoned for irreverently speaking of Mr. Moses seeing God. I then took the Investigator, and with others assumed the name of Infidel. It was given to us by the orthodox. I was proud of the term, and held that name twenty-six years, and should longer had I not found a better one. Thirty years ago I became a convert to Spiritualism, and hav never seen occasion to change my faith, which has grown with my knowledge. This knowledge increased till I became a writing medium of impressions; not only that, but a seeing medium. I call my friends and seat them in a chair. When seated I see them as when clothed in flesh, and talk with them or I talk for them. They impress me to do this. Call this, if you will, hallucination, but to me it is proof positiv that we liv again.

Please send me your "Infidel Abroad," and set me down as one to pay $5.00 for your trip around the world. Yours truly, JOHN D. POWERS.

READING, MICH., Feb. 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Find post-office order for three dollars for the renewal of my paper another year. I like the sledge-hammer blows that you deal old orthodoxy; but I disapprove of your communism and your proposed method of taxation. To me, as to millions of others, it would look more reasonable or consistent to divide up at once than to go through your graded-taxation system farce that I read in your paper a few weeks since.

You may count me among the three hundred for a "V" toward your journey around the world. I think you should hav $2,500 instead of $1,500 to do justice to the undertaking; and I think it can be raised if Liberals will make an effort. I think I shall be able to send you a few names to help make up the amount. H. N. ROUTY.

WALTHAM, MASS., March 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You may count me one for your trip around the world, though I would rather you would stay at home and giv the Christians your broadsides of shot and shell. I did think of letting THE TRUTH SEEKER go, but hav concluded to hang on for $3; every one helps a little. Yours truly,

GEORGE B. HEYWORTH.

MT. JACKSON, VA., March 3, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: As I see no one in Virginia makes a start toward raising the thing needful for your trip around the world, please find inclosed money order for $8—$5.00 for around the world and $3.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as my time is nearly out, and I can't do without your paper. If you should not take the trip around the world I will take five dollars' worth of books. Yours very truly, LEONARD WALTERS.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., March 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav $5 that says go around the world. L. S. BURDICK.

PENTWATER, MICH., Feb. 28, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: You can count on me for $5 for your trip around the world. I will subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER about the first of April. Hoping you may be able to start as soon as the warm weather appears, and hav a pleasant trip, I remain, Yours, etc., C. J. PECK.

MODESTO, CAL., Feb. 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I send with this the payment of my subscription to your paper. Send me word when your trip around the world is decided on, and I will forward $20 by express for four of the books. I hope you may receive every encouragement and soon start. Believe me, Yours truly, D. C. COLEMAN.

BUCYRUS, OHIO, March 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Put me down for five dollars for the voyage around the world. Yours for the right,

SOL. BENSON.

PRINCETON, MO., Feb. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: The Methodists hav built a new church on our prairie. It is not yet paid for. They hav had a big meeting in it; run it for some ten days. Some of the members got revived up, but they failed to catch a sinner, and providence smiled on them with so much snow, rain, and sleet that they could not get to church, so the meeting broke up without being dismissed. It was then given out that it would begin again in three days. There were three who went through snow and rain. The house was locked, and of course they left, and that is the last of it. I was not there at all, nor did I giv anything toward building it. My wife is a strong Methodist, and tried to get me to giv, but failed; then the circuit preacher came and was anxious I should at least giv some timber for foundation, etc. I finally said to him, "Here is a letter of Bob Ingersoll's; if you will read it and then say that you think I ought to giv some timber I will do so." He wouldn't read, so I thought that that let me out.

You can put me down for a book describing your trip around the world. T. W. LEMMAX.

LANCASTER, WIS., Feb. 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hope you will make the proposed trip around the world. You may put me down for $5 to help pay your expenses. Any time you may need the money please notify and it will be sent at once. Your sincere friend,

JACOB NATHAN.

THIS SETTLES IT.—THE LORD SAYS "GO."

The prophet Tanner has had another talk with the Lord and again speaks. The Lord is on our side.

UNION, UTAH.

MR. BENNETT: When I learned you had some notion of taking a trip around the world, feeling interested in such an important enterprise, I made it my business to inquire of the Lord immediately to know whether or not it was in accordance with his divine will. Having been successful in obtaining a message bearing directly upon the subject in question, I feel in duty bound to make known its contents. I hope and trust you will in no way be offended in consequence of my making such inquiry in your behalf. At any rate, here it is:

"Verily, verily, saith the Lord God, hearken unto me and I will reveal my will that you may know of a surety the Lord liveth who revealeth his will unto the children of men. Inasmuch as you hav inquired of me to know if the intended journey of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is in accordance with my divine will, verily I say it is, and I will make it a pleasant one for him. Hav I not chosen him even from before the creation of the world for the accomplishment of this very thing? Yea, verily I say unto you, I hav. And his name is recorded in the Lamb's book of Life as one of the apostles of the new dispensation, never to be erased, but to be handed down from one generation to another for the good of mankind hereafter. Even as Galileo, Newton, Herschel, Shakspere, Bacon, and Franklin hav been apostles in their own times for the advancement of knowledge, so shall he be. Yea, verily I say unto you, those are some of the twelve chosen from before the foundation of the world as the apostles of the new dispensation. Behold, I am their God, and my name is Liberty and Free Speech."

A. A. TANNER.

Of course we are overwhelmed with gratitude that the Lord takes such an interest in us, and that he givs his vote in favor of our swinging round the circle of the planet, that he promises us a pleasant journey, a safe return, and most of all that he has written our name in the Lamb's book of Life. We had not the slightest idea that such was the fact. But if he had only sent us some $2,500 to pay our traveling expenses, and about twice as much to help keep up THE TRUTH SEEKER in our absence, it would hav been the handsome thing, and hav won our esteem and confidence from that moment. The Lord is thought to be far richer than Vanderbilt, Jay Gould, Tom Scott, and Bill Astor all combined, and he could hav spared the amount named without feeling it. If the earth were ours, and the fulness thereof, or if we only owned a thousand hills and all the cattle thereon, we would cheerfully make him a present of $7,500. We duly appreciate being ranked with Galileo, Shakspere, Newton, Herschel, Bacon, and Franklin. We like that sort of company. We far prefer such to Comstock, Colgate, and Joe Cook; but we had no idea that the Lord had had his friendly eye on us so long, and that he had selected us to make this proposed trip from before the creation of the world. Why, that was a long time ago indeed! We trust we feel duly thankful for this partiality, and hope not to disgrace it.

The great difficulty with us is to really believe without a doubt that the great God who got up millions of worlds from non-existence—who brought a vast amount of something from nothing, and all somewhere and everywhere from nowhere—really spoke the above. We hav a lingering fear that the prophet Tanner may be just a little bit mistaken. But we are inclined to think he is just as honest and reliable as Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Joe Smith, and Brigham Young; and that God speaks through him just as much as them; and that is not saying very much either. We are certainly much pleased with God's new names, "Liberty" and "Free Speech." They are far preferable to "Jahveh," "Yahweh," "Jehovah," the "God of War," the "Lord of Hosts," the "God of Battles," a "Jealous God," a "God of Anger," a "God of Wrath," and all the rest of it. Let us hope that God, even, is improving as he grows older. Liberty and FREE SPEECH forever! —ED. T. S.

THIS SETTLES IT MORE.

DEAR BENNETT: I hav watched this thing closely. I want to jump the same way the cat does. I see clearly she's crouching for a leap clear around the world this time; and, as she is a pretty good kind of cat, she will take you along. The Asiatics are fond of cats, particularly tiger cats, and you will be well introduced, if not chawed up. I hav been opposed all the time to your going, and I thought it would be a good idea for you to take the trip. It seemed to me you were needed here, and I spoke to several good Liberals about sending you around the world because I knew Macdonald and all the rats in the printing-office would play while the cat's away. How that fellow that first broached it got the idea I do not know, but I certainly first thought of it. I wanted a book on original Ah Sin, and I know you, O Infidel sinner, could write one as none of the righteous could. I hav been talking that book up ever since—in fact canvassing for it. Got all my wife's relations to subscribe for it first while there was some doubt about it, but now that you are sure to go and the book as good as writ I subscribe myself. I will take a copy when it is published, not before, and will pay $5 for it C. O. D.—at three day's sight—when the book is presented—provided I read it first, and see that you put plenty of Ah Sin in it. Nothing stingy about any subscription of mine.

Yours to the farthest verge of the green earth,

TEE CEE LEE.

P. S.—If you don't go I won't take the book. I knew you would not all the time.

N. B.—If you go within a mile of Whang Lee you are welcome to the best the house affords. He is a distant relation of mine (13,000 miles). Just mention my name and every latch-string in China will fly out. T. C. L.

PAINE'S MONUMENT.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1, 1881.

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ.: Do try and instil into the members of the Liberal Club and kindred believers the necessity of immediate action in regard to the movement to restore the monument of Thomas Paine. I would prefer to see a new creation somewhere in our midst in conjunction with the repairing of the one at New Rochelle, and I would be willing to subscribe thereto if you can make it feasible. Now that the initiatory step has been taken, I hope you will see that it is carried out so that the vilifiers of Paine cannot say he has been forgotten, or if remembered, nothing more substantial is given than empty words. Let your members leave the diverse and intricate paths of theoretical verbosity; let Mr. Andrews, whom I admire very much, possibly because I still hav a reverence for that which passeth my understanding—let him approach within our reach, and with his efforts and a concerted action by all not only repair this one but in the near future giv a new expression of our appreciation of this grand abolitionist of humanity. I inclose herewith one dollar, and if you will press the matter I will write again. Yours, INFIDELIS.

THE GRAVE OF GEORGE ELIOT.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Feb. 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: On a wretched wet day at Highgate Cemetery was consigned to earth the remains of George Eliot. A young lady near the spot went and looking into the puddled hole inquired, "Is this the grave of George Eliot?" On being informed it was even so, she inquired further why they did not bury her in Westminster Abbey.

Genius and worth and talent alone are not the passport for honorable burial. Wealth and title and fashion must combine, or the funeral will be very unostentatious.

The poor unconscious dust may be slighted, but this star of genius, the author of "Romola" and of "Daniel Deronda," like the fixed stars of the firmament, will shine with unborrowed luster long after those who slighted her are forgotten.

F. J. EMARY.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Feb. 23, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: Will you be kind enough to head this letter with the name J. C. Bundy, that he may know that I want my name taken off his mail list? I cannot stomach my name, hard as it is, on the little tab on his R.-P. J. (Regular Pharisaical Junk), not even as a dead-head, till December, '81, as the tab indicates.

Evidently he or some other friend got my name and address from a recent letter in your paper, in which I incidentally mentioned the fact that I am a Spiritualist. J. C. Bundy carefully omits to print the town and state of his correspondents' residence wherever the subject matter makes it possible for him to do so. It is evident from this that he does not relish the idea of his readers being free to judge of right and truth only from his standpoint. It appears to me, Mr. Editor, that the patrons of a newspaper ought to insist upon not being impounded in this way. If we submit to thus being "corraled," are we not sure to be fed much that is erroneous, and perhaps, if free hate be uppermost, that which is infamously untrue?

Now, if J. C. Bundy dares, let him giv me and thousands of others a chance to send his patrons a sample copy of any free-principles paper we may choose to send them, by printing the addresses as well as the names of his correspondents. Freethinkers want nothing more than a free fight. Nobody's exclusiv "wing" for me. DR. GEORGE HARDCASTLE.

CANTON, ILL., Feb. 28, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The following slip is cut from the Canton Ledger: "Mr. James Stockdale will make an opera house of his late purchase, the Lutheran church building, if he can get some assistance from our citizens. Here is a chance to secure a good place for public entertainments."

Mr. Stockdale, if I am not much mistaken, is a Liberal. I suggest that this is an excellent opportunity for the Liberals of Canton and vicinity to confer with Mr. Stockdale, and, if agreeable to him, organize a stock company and purchase the building, and then organize a Liberal League.

Yours truly, J. W. A.

DOVER, N. H., March 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: My patron saint is Judas. "Cos why?" If it hadn't been for him Jesus would hav been a failure, and I think he was as it is.

Yours truly, A. M. CANNEY.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Feb. 28, 1881.

MY DEAR BENNETT: Your proposed trip around the world meets my approbation, with the exception that to do justice to the subjects of observation you ought to be absent two years at least, and your expenditures should be thousands of dollars instead of hundreds, as contemplated.

There is much that needs correction. Myers, in his "Remains of Lost Empires," wandering among ruins, wherever he saw the phallic emblem cut upon stones, called it a cross, and evidence that Christ formerly had been worshiped. Wm. H. Seward, visiting Buddhistic pagodas, and seeing sculptured images of the infant Christna and his mother, thought it was copied from the Madonna and the little Jesus..

Egypt and India are full of treasures to throw light on our civilization and systems of religion. It only wants a keen observer not wedded to creeds to journey through those countries and gather the diamonds of wisdom scattered all around.

Elephanta should be visited by you, and instead of hours, you should spend days there and write an ordinary volume from that spot of facts you could collect in regard to its secrets.

And going or coming, I would love to hav you visit the Eastern Isles and inspect those giant statues there, the relics of fifty thousand years, and the remains of a submerged continent, over which rolls in silent and solemn grandeur the waves of the mighty Pacific.

Were I wealthy, friend Bennett, I would love to be your traveling companion and aid you in the grand work you contemplate. Mrs. Dr. Buckner wrote you that I was good for $5 on demand.

Truly yours, G. W. BROWN, M.D.

MAUSTON, WIS., March 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: This place is becoming celebrated as a Liberal stronghold. Concluded my second course of ten lectures last night in Opera Hall. Am to giv a third course commencing to-night There is scarcely a town in Wisconsin that might not hav a rousing series of lectures every three or six months. Messrs. Holgate, Sykes, Phillips, Alsbacher, Turner, Judge Grote, Adler, Kailer, and others too numerous to mention, are the activ Liberals here.

Yours fraternally, W. F. JAMIESON.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 26, 1881.

CHAMPION OF TRUTH: I am not dead yet, but read your paper as regularly as I eat my meals, and try to digest every subject. I also try to keep up with the advancing column of Freethinkers. I hav obtained a great amount of genuin happiness by reading works issued from your office. May the angels bless and prosper you in your good work for mankind. I hope to see you before many weeks elapse and take one good look at a hero, for it is a long time since I saw one—one of the right kind. Adieu.

Your admirer, EMANUEL M. JONES.

HAZLETON, PA., Feb. 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your most valuable journal of Freethought and reform comes to hand every week regularly, and hardly can I wait till the week expires to note its appearance. Here in the coal regions many Freethinkers may be found, but the majority of them are somewhat backward in expressing their views. Here the priests hav the upper hand, and they of course liv like kings. The members of their flock invariably make confessions, and for them to utter one word against the doings of the priest would in their mind be condemnation forever. Right in this little borough I could name at least one hundred Infidels, but they dare not express themselvs as such, or the church-going populace would look upon them as "agents of the devil." That's what the jumping Methodist minister of this place terms them. In his sermon a few Sundays since he went on to say that his flock was decreasing. "Agents of the devil are in our midst. Bob. Ingersoll," he said, "is the general agent, and he is every day adding to his flock. Parents, teach your children the doctrin of Christianity. Don't let your girls stay out after church. I know there are lots of young men who come to this church just for the sake of escorting the fair ones of our flock to their homes," etc. Now, if the above sayings do not help to increase the ranks of Infidelity, then I am willing to surrender myself immediately to the hypocrits of Christianity. Yes, immediately, and never again to utter one word against them. I hav studied the question thoroughly, although I am an Infidel of only three years' standing, and a reader of that noble expounder, THE TRUTH SEEKER, for only nine months, but I hope I will be able to continue to read the same until I turn gray. My father and mother were true Christians, and they taught me nothing but the Christian doctrin, but since I hav studied the two questions thoroughly I hav resolved to stick to the truth. The reverend gentlemen are very friendly with me, and I suppose they think they can again mislead me into their rotten paths; but no, they are mistaken if they imagin anything of the kind. When I believed in the doctrins, ghost stories, and had many other such hypocritical ideas, I might say I was afraid of my own shadow. On retiring to bed a faint idea or imagination would come over me and I would see standing at my bedside something that would nearly scare me into fits. One night after being in bed a few minutes something approached me, stood there for a couple of seconds, and then disappeared. I of course was fearfully frightened and could not sleep a wink, and after lying in a state of wakefulness for some length of time I received what may be called a fearful "difter" right square on the nose. I jumped out of bed, skirmished the entire room, but could find nothing. What could it hav been, dear reader? I said then it was a ghost, but I say now it was nothing more than imagination and sole belief in the Christian doctrins that caused me to receive that blow or "difter" on the proboscis. That "difter" on the proboscis was what caused me to make an investigation, and one which proved successful in every sense of the word. I hope that all those who are still bound in those infernal chains of Christianity will read this article and follow its course. When the (in your mind) day of resurrection comes to hand, I for one will be prepared. Following is a short poem which I wrote while sitting in my bedroom thinking over the miseries of Christendom:

INFIDELITY.

From the time of Paine, some years ago,
  Infidelity has grown a great teacher to be;
Many smart men in its paths hav trod
  Who tried to set all nations free.

Paine, he never lacked the courage
  To expose the sayings of scripture;
Night and day he studied hard,
  And by it drew the first picture.

But, alas! grim death came to his door,
  To take away a man of spirit and nerve;
But what was it to him, dear friend,
  He had no God or devil to serve.

Thousands more hav fallen in the line,
  Noble sons of their own free thought;
Men who hav the use of free speech
  Hav into the line been brought.

With them Bob Ingersoll stepped in;
  To-day we hear it preached in every town;
And the time is not far distant, dear friend,
  When religion, with all its hypocrits, will be knocked down.

Every young man who upholds free speech, free thought, a free country, and freedom of the press should not hesitate in joining the Liberal League. We should hav one in this borough, but at present the chances are rather slim. In the near future we may stand some show of organizing. I would send you a small contribution with this letter, but I am, like all of my class (printers), a little hard up. You will hear from me again. I am yet in the years of rising manhood (twenty-one) and hope to write you many more letters. I remain your Infidel friend,

W. H. WEIDENBACH.

NORDHOFF, CAL., Feb. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a very good Christian friend who sends me the Chicago Standard, a weekly paper devoted to the gospel according to John Calvin, and in looking over a late number I find the following item, which I think decidedly rich: "A nation's greatest need is not statesmen, not troops, not territory, not wealth, not intelligence, but men who fear God." The same paper has a long article setting forth the importance of "evangelizing America for the sake of the world." And having that object in view it is undoubtedly a grand idea to raise up a generation of cowards controled by fear alone.

I like the new dress of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and think the paper is improving in its general make-up, but I think it will be unnecessary for you to make any reply to friend Mair, as Mrs. Besant's showing of the influence of Christianity on the world will be sufficient reply to all he can say in its favor. I am glad you open your columns to the discussion of sister Slenker's hobby. It is a subject that is of vital importance to the human race. I think Elmina has the right ideas on the sexual question, and is worthy of the highest commendation for her brave defense of her principles.

Yours fraternally, FRED. ROBINSON.

ONONDAGA VALLEY, N. Y., Feb. 28, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: We hav two insurance offices in this place; one nearly first-class for a country office, and Presbyterian; the other about fourth or fifth-class, and Methodist (one-horse concern); but both insure at the same rate. As the former is the most grand and popular, it gets the most custom. Prayers are said in both every Sabbath, and blessings asked for the people. Most of them seem to be satisfied with the promis of the kingdom of heaven in a future state. They don't seem to like infidels very well, and seem to believe all the evil in the world comes by them. They are real idolators of their own views, and shut their ears to all arguments of their opponents, and claim that all knowledge of science came by the Christian religion. To believe an impossibility they call a virtue, and not to believe it a crime. Belief is the great point on which salvation turns. If you believe Samson caught the foxes, and his other exploits in strength, and that Jonah swallowed the whale, you are safe. Anything that will show you are destitute of brains or reason will insure you that you are booked for the kingdom of heaven with a through ticket. If you use reason or common sense you will hav to take the down-hill road; but the old generalissimo's caldron is so much out of order of late that it is not much feared. Many good people hav doubts of the Bible being all truth, but dare not say so.

Christians seem to think Infidels hav no rights which they ought to respect. Some ministers say we ought not to study science, for it will make us skeptical on religion. Perhaps that may be true. I am a lover of it, and can't well help it; and if I could I don't wish to. I think science is the salvation of the world, because it does away with superstition, which is the greatest devil on the globe to-day and causes the most misery. R. C.

GRANT, PA., Feb. 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am a reader and an admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, although not a subscriber; hav read your letters from Europe with pleasure and profit. I send $10.00 for the inclosed list of books as per advertisement in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

H. F. BECK.

GREENVILLE, OR., Feb. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER, also five dollars for your book you wrote in prison. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than any other paper. I look on you as one of the people's deliverers. You are doing a glorious work, striking right home to the point. These Christian sects I do not like. They are a great curse to the world. They are a curse too grievous to bear. I am no writer; I am a farmer, and the farmers are the most oppressed of any people on the Pacific coast, the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer; lots of law but no justice. Nature is my God; my religion is to do what is right. H. BENNETT.

Don't Think.

[The following is from Zion's Herald, and is an excellent setting forth of what is required of Christian devotees:]

Oh, leave thyself to God! And if indeed
'Tis given thee to perform so vast a task,
Think not at all—think not, but kneel and ask.
O friend, by thought was never creature freed
From any sin, from any mortal need;
Be patient! not by thought canst thou devise
What course of life for thee is right and wise;
It will be written up, and thou wilt read.

Don't think. If you think you will weep,
And your sight will grow even more dim,
And your heart will more grievously ache,
And your life be more burdened for him.

Don't think; banish memory; work;
Work early and late with a will;
For work to the wretched is all
Of earth's good that is left to them still.

Don't think; if you think you will doubt,
And doubting will lead to despair;
Confusions, cross-purposes, still,
Enigmas, are here and there.

Don't think; just work on while you can;
And then sit and listen, and pray
For those who but lately began
To feel the fierce heat of the day.

Don't think; just go on to your grave;
Amid the low daisies so sweet,
Somewhere by the soft singing wave
It lieth, not far from your feet.

Don't think; just be patient and still;
Leave all the dire puzzle of fate
To One who, with infinit skill,
Will solve it, and never too late.

The Liberal's Demand.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

The laws are partial to the church,
We on our shoulders feel her weight,
For constantly she tries her best,
To crush us and to rule the state.

Their costly buildings are untaxed;
This is unjust and needs correction,
Let them their share of taxes bear,
Or, no taxes, no protection.

Their chaplains are in Congress halls,
And in the nation's army too;
Thus we are taxed to help support
Religion and an idle crew.

Now, should the state hire Infidels
To teach their views in halls or schools,
And churchmen taxed for their support,
Would they not kick like government mules?

We are forbid to testify
As witnesses in courts of law,
If we should say there is no God,
A being no man ever saw,

Though principles we do adore
Opposed to bondage of the mind,
Reason and liberty their name,
And in our hearts they are enshrined.

One day in seven the churches claim;
For impudence this is sublime.
If we should play or work that day,
They stamp the action as a crime.

The laws, except for conscience' sake.
Some Baptists and the Jews as well,
But it denies the right to us,
To play that day, or buy or sell.

We are worshipers of nature,
With her we hold all days alike,
But priests would make us honor God
By force of law; this we dislike.

What right hav they to order us
How we should spend the holy day?
Chinese or Jews might just as well
Command all men to go their way.

Is Christianity by law
Established in fair freedom's land,
Although the Constitution says
That Congress shall not so command?

Does not the Constitution giv,
As great a right to us to make Them honor Paine, despise their God?
Who helped us most, for goodness' sake?

Was not King George, by grace of God,
Our king? But Paine despised the fraud;
Our cause with Washington he fought,
And conquered England's king and God.

Then we demand that Uncle Sam
Shall rule, not God, or freedom dies;
Free us from oaths and Sabbath laws,
And all our taxes equalize.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness--Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice or this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Manhattan Medical Institute.

Established 1865. Incorporated in accordance with the laws of the state of New York. This institute, so long and favorably known under the superintendence of Dr. Kinget since 1865, is located at 317 East 14th street, a few doors east from Second avenue, New York. Having been engaged in the special practice of treating chronic diseases for over thirty years, Dr. Kinget is able to concentrate his long experience for the benefit of his patients, many of whom are located in every state of the Union, the Dominion of Canada, and the British Isles. Dr. Kinget, a graduate of King's College, London, England, is the author of "Medical Good Sense," "Sexual Philosophy," "The Natural Law of Population," and is editor of the Health Journal. This Institute is conducted by a staff of experienced, skilful physicians, who devote their whole time and attention to the treatment of all CHRONIC DISEASES of BOTH SEXES in separate departments. The Institute is well known to many leading physicians, to whom reference can be made, who will giv assurance that all patients will be treated skilfully and honorably. Among other diseases of a chronic nature, special attention is given here to those of the nervous system, as Seminal Weakness, Nervous Exhaustion, Impotency, Epilepsy, Diseases of the Bladder, Lungs, Kidneys, and Skin, Syphilitic, and Scrofulous diseases, and all Diseases of Women. Questions for invalids sent free on application.

A Series of Letters written During a Visit of Ten Weeks in Europe.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

850 pages. Price, $1.50

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

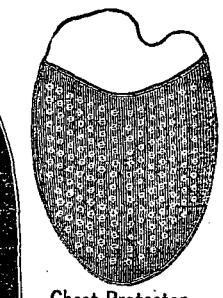
MEDICAL ELECTRICIAN,

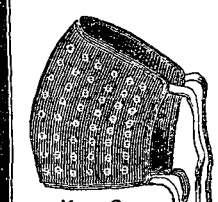
Inventor of the "WILSONIA," and Lecturer on Electrical Therapeutics, Author of "The Trial of Medicine," "The Language of Disease," Medical Fallacies," &c., &c.,



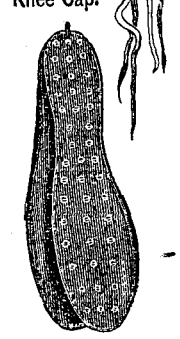
465 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN,

May be Consulted Daily from 10 A.M. to 8 P.M. Free of Charge!

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere pads or plasters which lose their efficacy in a few weeks, but are so scientifically constructed that they WILL LAST FOR TWENTY YEARS, and can be worn by different members of the same family from time to time.

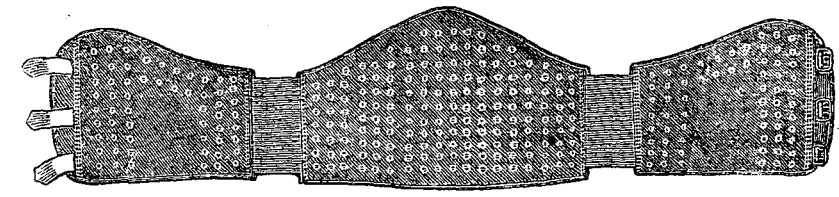


Lung Invigorator.



Chest Protector.

Anklet.



Knee Cap.

Shoulder Belt.

In-Soles.

Sciatica and Lumbago Belt.

DESCRIPTION OF ABOVE GARMENTS.

Each Eylet is a galvanic cell attached to a series of powerful magnets. They are light as ordinary garments, and produce a soothing yet exhilirating effect upon the system, without causing shocks or sores, as in electric belts or galvanic chains.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are the Despair of Physicians, and the Annihilation of Quack Nostrums and Legalized Quackery. Thonsands of persons are being constantly hurried on to Apoplexy and Paralysis by the use of Cephalic Snuffs and Washes. Catarrh can be readily cured without any of these nostrums.

THE "WILSONIA" CORSET AND MAGNETIC BELT

For Ladies and Gentlemen will cure Asthma, Catarrh, Loss of Energy, Nervous Debility, Bleeding at the Lungs, Kidney Disease, Tumors, Rheumatism, Gout, Paralysis, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, and every form of Female Weakness.

SEND FOR PRICE LIST Containing THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere plasters which become useless after a few weeks' wear, but they retain their curativ powers for twenty years, and can be worn by any member of the same family from time to time.

Persons who read this notice may wonder that I had not advertised my discovery before. The fact is, I determined when I arrived in America not to publicly advertise until I had five hundred patients in one city, to whom I could refer as evidence. I hav now over one thousand persons in the city of Brooklyn ready to testify that my galvano-magnetic belts will remove and cure every malady known to man, except a rotten lung, and even where the lungs hav begun to decay, my appliances will arrest the decay and heal them.

Here in the city of Brooklyn the paralyzed hav been restored; patients suffering from inflammatory rheumatism hav been taken off their crutches; nerve maladies, bearing on mania, hav been completely cured; martyrs to varicose veins, whose legs hav been bound in elastic stockings for twenty years, hav cut away their bandages, and are now as free from varicose veins as the healthiest person living; children who had never walked from birth up to three, eight, and twelve years of age, are now walking about as other children. In short, the cures effected by my appliances seem so miraculous that the above statements sound like an Arabian Night's tale. Nevertheless, these facts can all be substantiated, and my open letter to the physicians and the Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn must convince the most incredulous that my invention is the most wonderful on record.

My offer of five thousand dollars to the physicians and Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn is still open, and will continue so to be for six months.

I am prepared to go into the hospitals and will only take their incurable cases, suffering from paralysis, locomotor ataxia, inflammatory and chronic rheumatism, congestion of the kidneys, pleuro-pneumonia, or any disease their medicins hav failed to reach—less an absolutely decayed lung.

If the citizens of Brooklyn continue to suffer from any of the above maladies, they hav themselvs to blame.

The cost of my appliances, though seemingly expensiv, is one hundred times cheaper than the present method of purchasing physicians' prescriptions and paying for their drugs.

Send to me for price lists and testimonials, and make full inquiries of those who hav been cured, before you waste your time in calling upon me.

I court the fullest scrutiny, and prefer not selling you goods until you hav inquired of those who hav been cured.

To you who are suffering, and are now under the care of your physicians, prevail on them to call upon me, and acquaint themselvs with my invention before making any statements in regard to the same.

Note the address, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

Male and female assistants always in attendance from 10 o'clock, A.M., till 8 o'clock, P.M.

My appliances are being used with as marked success in England as in Brooklyn and New York

Gems of Thought.

DOGMATISM is puppyism come to its full growth. —Douglas Jerrold.

THE men of the Reformation conquered for us the right of free inquiry in scripture; but modern science has conquered for itself the right of free inquiry about scripture.—Strauss.

THE solemn seriousness of religion has a strong attraction for me; but the levities of religion, so to speak, its fables and fancies and conceits, which are insisted on as part and parcel of it, are very repulsiv.—Waters' Through Rome On.

His name was Talus, made of iron mold,
Immovable, resistless, without end,
Who, in his hand, an iron flail doth hold,
With which he threshed out falsehood and did truth unfold. —Spenser's Faerie Queene.

THERE is a set of ecclesiastics who will not read a book, a newspaper, or argue with any one who does not reflect their own sentiments. They look into the glass and say, "I see every time I look there one who always agrees with me." That is their whole world, and of the rest they are profoundly ignorant.—Dr. Norman Macleod.

ORTHODOX, orthodox,
Wha believe in John Knox,
Let me sound an alarm to your conscience:
There's a heretic blast
Has blown in the Wast,
That what is not sense must be nonsense.
—Burns.

TAKE courage; hav freedom at any price. Mental slavery is the most degrading. If, in bursting your fetters, you should receive a wound, time will heal it; and though bigotry may point to the scar as a mark of degradation, it will be to yourself and to the progressiv a proud mark obtained in the cause of true liberty.—McDonnell's Exeter Hall.

IF Protestantism cannot prevent Infidelity, neither could Catholicism prevent Protestantism; and to charge Theodore Parker upon Luther is as unfair as it would be to charge Luther upon Leo. Back of them both was a power which was before either, and which they were unable to resist, and that power was the human mind, which is more than all churches and bibles.—O. B. Frothingham.

THE most cruel persecutions hav been carried out with perfect conscientiousness, and priests, with streaming eyes and bleeding hearts, hav burned heretics to the "greater glory of God." Conscience is not a safe guide; in fact, it is no guide at all. Conscience is not the eye which chooses the path, but the foot which blindly carries us wherever the brain directs.—Mrs. A. Besant.

ATHEISM would hav been the great and glorious finality of all real wisdom had it only been popular—had the wise few been allowed to think and speak freely their thoughts. But, alas, in even cultured Athens a disbelief in the gods was punishable with death, for then as now it was supposed that the very life of a nation depended upon a belief in and a placating of the gods! But then, as now, the leaders, those behind the scenes, were well aware of the impotence and worthlessness, as well as the mythical character, of their gods.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THE old theological reason for keeping Sunday can no longer be pressed. But the effects of Sabbath stillness does not depend on the Mosaic account of the creation. "The end of action is rest," says the greatest of the Greek philosophers, and his saying is the philosophical equivalent of the theological expression, "God rested on the seventh day." Rest is at the heart of all. A man who never reposes and never withdraws into himself runs a risk of going mad. It is the same with a nation, and assuredly never were the chimes which announce a respit from busy toil, care, and excitement more necessary than they are to a civilization like ours.—The Toronto Bystander.

SOME men are very often mistaken in their judgments. The reason thereof is, they converse with but one sort of men, they read but one sort of books, they will not come in the hearing of but one sort of notions; the truth is, they canton out to themselvs a little Goshen in the intellectual world where light shines and, as they conclude, day blesses them; but the rest of that vast expansum they giv up to night and darkness, and so avoid coming near it. . . . All such are far enough from that comprehensiv enlargement of mind which adorns a soul devoted to truth, assisted with letters and a free consideration of the several views of thinking men of all sides.—Locke.

GIV a ms. says Jesus, and all things are clean unto you. If I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, says Paul, and giv my body to be burned, and hav not charity, it profiteth me nothing. Paul urges rich men not to trust in riches, but to be rich in good works and ready to distribute; but he does not bid them get rid of their wealth; nay, he says it is right for parents to lay up for their children. So far from bidding "to giv to every one that asketh," he distinctly commands to refuse support to the idle. Industry is with Paul a positiv duty—a sentiment which cannot be discovered in the precepts of Jesus, who teaches that to abandon one's trade and wander at his side is highly meritorious.—F. W. Newman.

CHRISTIANITY is at bay within Christendom. The Christian world contains more non-Christians and anti-christians than Christians, more unbelievers than believers, more unworshipful than worshipful, more lukewarm than ardent, more irreverent people than reverent. The Naturalists outnumber the Supernaturalists. The Rationalists carry more weight than the pietists. This is so, at all events, in the centers of thought; and the centers of thought are the fountains of thought. The live mind of the world (meaning by live mind inquiring mind) is deserting Christianity for philosophy, science, and literature. But a more decisiv indication of the decline of the Christian system, as interpreted by Protestants of all degrees, from Lutheran to Universalist and Unitarian, is the all but complete divorce of the system from popular life.—O. B. Frothingham.

Odds and Ends.

A CINCINNATI man found a rough-looking individual in his cellar. "Who are you?" he demanded. "The gas man, come to take the meter," was the reply. "Great heavens!" cried the householder, "I hoped you were only a burglar." —Boston Post.

"I THREW this off in ten minutes," softly said the poet, placing a manuscript on the editorial table. The editor said that when it came to speed no long-haired poet should distance him—and he threw it off in less than ten seconds—off the table into the waste basket.

What is that little grassy mound,
Where pretty roses bloom?
Your brother lies beneath that ground,
'Tis little Oscar's tomb.

Alas! did little Oscar die?
How dismal it must be
To bid this lovely world good-by!
It seems quite sad to me.

But though his lifeless form lies here,
His spirit livs above.
And sees with vision bright and clear
The God of life and love.

That is, the Bible tells us so,
But I've five dollars home
That says that Oscar's turned to mud,
And with God will never roam.

A MEAN MAN.—Mr. Elijah Hitchcock was a Connecticut constable, whose character was under scrutiny. Deacon Solomon Rising was inquired of about him.

"Deacon Solomon Rising," said the questioner, "do you think Mr. Hitchcock is a dishonest man?" (Very promptly) "Oh, no, sir, not by any means."

"Well, do you think he is a mean man?"

"Well, with regard to that," said the deacon a little more deliberately, "I mean to say that I don't really think he is a mean man; I've sometimes thought he was what you might call a keerful man—a prudent man."

"What do you mean by a prudent man?"

"Well, I mean this, that one time he had an execution for $4 against old Widow Witter, back here, and he went up to her house and levied on a flock of ducks. He chased them ducks, one at a time, round the house pooty much all day, and every time he catched a duck he'd set right down and ring his neck and charge mileage; and his mileage 'mounted to more than the debt. Nothin' mean about it as I know of, but I always thought after that that Mr. Hitchcock was a very prudent man."

WANTED IT JUST RIGHT.—"How much will this cost in your paper?" asked a quiet-looking man, as he handed in the following advertisement at the Brooklyn Eagle counting-room:

"Smith—Busted a trace, in this city, Friday, just after dinner, Mary Smith, wife of the undersigned, and daughter of old Sim Pratt, the leading blacksmith of Denver, Col. The corpse was highly respected by the high-toned families, but death got the drop on her, and she took the up-bucket with perfect confidence that she would hav a square show the other side of the divide. The plant transpires this afternoon at her boarding-house on Willow street. Come one, come all.

"Dearest Mary, thou hast left us,
For you on earth there wasn't room;
But 'tis heaven that has bereft us,
And snatched our darling up the flume.

"Denver papers please copy and send bill or draw on sight.

"By her late husband, P. SMITH."

"I don't believe you want it in just that way, do you?" asked the clerk, rubbing his chin dubiously.

"Why not, stranger?" asked the quiet man.

"It don't read quite right, does it?" asked the clerk.

"Was you acquainted with the corpse, stranger?" demanded the quiet man. "Was you aware of the lamented while she was bustling around in society down at the boarding-house?"

"I don't know that I ever met her," responded the clerk.

"So I reckoned, Jedge. You wasn't up to the deceased when she was in the living business. Now, Jedge, the deceased wrote that oration herself afore she died, and I want it in. Do you hook on, partner?"

"But it isn't our style of notice," objected the clerk.

"Nor mine, neither," acquiesced the quiet man. "I was for having a picture of her and a lot more talk, but she said she wanted it quiet and modest, so she whooped that up. Say, stranger, is it going into your valuable space without any difficulty?"

"I don't know," said the clerk, dolefully.

"I know, partner. This celebration comes off to-morrow afternoon, and that's going in in the morning, if it goes in out of a cannon. I got grief enough on my hands now, stranger, without erecting a fort on the sidewalk, but if you want war, I hav the implements right in the back part of these mourning clothes. What d'ye think, Jedge?"

"Does it make any difference where it goes?" asked the clerk.

"I want it in the paper," said the mourner, "and it's going in if it takes a pile-driver. Think you twig my racket, stranger?"

"All right," replied the clerk. "I'll put it in the 'Salad,' among other mournful remarks. Four dollars, please."

"That's business," and the quiet man paid the money. "If you ain't busy come around to-morrow. I'm going to giv the old woman a send off, and if the gospeller don't work up a pretty good program before he gets to the doxology, his folks will think he's been doing considerable business with a saw-mill. She was a good one, Jedge, and she was pious from the back of her neck to the bunion on her heel; you can tell that from the notice;" and the mourning widower wiped his eyes on the sly, and later in the day was fined $10 for thrashing the undertaker who had put silver handles on the casket instead of gold.

Notes and Clippings.

A BALTIMORE religious paper says that ministerial loafers are an abomination.

ABOUT a quarter of the Vermont towns hav elected women as superintendents of schools.

SPURGEON says that there is a great deal of prayer which is done in an objectionable manner.

THE Rev. Dr. Platt, San Francisco, in a very strong and ably argumentativ speech said that Christianity in San Francisco was virtually dead.

A WRITER in the Whitehall Review says that rest would cure half the ills to which horseflesh is heir, but people will not giv it, because it costs money.

THE Rev. D. P. Mitchell of Topeka has been found guilty by his Methodist conference of using the church money dishonestly to promote his candidacy for Congress.

THE world has ended to the Rev. Dr. Cummings, the celebrated Second-Advent preacher. He is hopelessly insane. It is the old story over again—too much religion.

THE public debt of the United States is $68 per head; of Spain, $154; of France, $136; of England, $117; of Holland, $114; of Canada, $28; of Mexico, $39; of Switzerland, $2.

THE publication of the revised New Testament has been postponed until May. There is no telling what will become of the unfortunate people who die before the correct edition comes out.

FORTY-FIVE years ago the Rev. Leonard Woods, D.D., of Andover, wrote that he could remember the time when he could count up forty intemperate ministers at no great distance from his home.

THE latest novelty in Spiritualism is the production of ghostly lights in dark seances. The luminous shapes are crosses, circles, triangles, and other emblems, and they float mysteriously over the heads of the spectators. A Boston medium is the producer.

ANTI-MONOPLY leagues are being rapidly organized in all directions, and are growing in strength every day. By the time another general election is held they will undoubtedly be strong enough to hav a decided effect upon the result. Monopolists may as well take warning.

A SECOND-ADVENT congregation at Greenwood, Kan., hav lost confidence in their pastor because, while publicly avowing a belief that the world would come to an end in 1881, he secretly took a note for five years on a loan of $1,000, and demanded twelve per cent interest with ample security.

WENDELL PHILLIPS said in a public address a few days before the assassination of the Czar: "I look at Russia, four thousand miles away, and see what incubus is resting on her people. I only hope that somebody will lift it off their shoulders. If nothing will do it but the dagger, then welcome the dagger."

THE Rev. Lloyd Morgan stole books from the Public Library of Cincinnati and was exposed. This episode did not end his ministerial career, nor hinder his getting a Baptist church at Kittenning, Pa. After a few years of successful hypocrisy he has again fallen into disgrace, a jury having convicted him on a criminal charge relating to a woman in his congregation.

SOME converts were to be baptized by immersion in the river at Pekin, Ill. The water was icy, which they had expected, and it was also muddy, which was something they could not make up their minds to bear. Therefore they went to a park in which was a mineral spring and pool, and the ceremony was performed in water strong with sulphur. Thus possibly sulphur may help to protect against other sulphur.

ACCORDING to our esteemed evening contemporary, the Graphic, Mr. Comstock has been at Albany advocating the passage of a bill conferring upon the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and especially upon Mr. Comstock himself, authority to enter any place suspected by him and make arrests without warrants. Reformers of this class will bear to be very closely watched.—Sun.

THE vice-president of the Western Lumbermen's Exchange estimates that, if the demand for lumber increases proportionately, the forests of the United States will be annihilated in twenty years. The same view is taken by the Northwestern Lumberman, which says that the "lumber supply of the Northwest is becoming so rapidly exhausted that within the next ten years something like a timber famin may be looked for."

SOME excavations commenced at the distance of about a kilometer from the walls of Pompeii, with a view to ascertaining the nature of the surroundings of the city, hav led to the discovery, within an area of but a few square miters, of thirty skeletons, ten of which were huddled together in one room of a small suburban villa, and among and upon the bones were found bracelets, necklaces, earrings, and other objects.

PROF. VIRCHOW, of Berlin, has lately dealt the vegetarians a blow. The advocates of a vegetable diet hav generally maintained that animal food was not natural to man. This is denied on anatomical and biological grounds by Prof. Virchow, who shows, as the result of anatomical inquiries, that not only man, but such animals as the gorilla, nearly allied to him in the scale of being, are indisputably fitted to be omniverous.

A YOUNG Men's Christian Association was an activ religious agency in nearly every city and large town in the United States ten years ago. Only a few of these organizations are in existence to-day, and the survivors are in the largest cities. It was found that they tended to draw young men away from the churches, and therefore they lost the countenance of the clergy, who hav gradually adopted most of the social ideas on which the associations were conducted.

WM. H. MONDAY, Rev. B. F. Reeves, and Rev. W. H. Hill, who are members of a temperance league, had sixty-four liquor dealers in the town of New Lots prosecuted for violation of the excise law, and complained of the indiscriminate manner in which licenses were granted by the excise commissioners. Soon after the cases of the liquor dealers came up before Judge Pratt, and they were all dismissed with costs. The costs amount to $1,000, and this the complainants will hav to pay.

THE Connecticut legislature, in attempting to pass laws restraining the practice of medicin by persons not properly qualified, finds itself placed in an awkward dilemma by the Spiritualists of the state, who openly announce that they will get even at the next elections if their clairvoyant doctors are interfered with. This appears to be by no means an idle threat. The Spiritualists claim that they can rely upon three thousand votes, and if that is true, as it may be, it means that they hold the balance of power, and can defeat the dominant party in the state.

THE scarcity of the fuel in the West is one of the noteworthy results of the severe winter. The heavy snow storms, some of them continuing days at a time, so generally imprisoned the farmers that in Iowa, Minnesota, and other western states the roads hav been impassable in many towns for weeks. Hay and corn are exclusivly used for fuel, but there is danger of exhausting even those materials. Farmers say that the winter set in so early and severely that much of the corn still stands in the fields under the snow, and much of their regular fall work was of necessity left undone.

THE ignorance and superstition existing in Austrian Poland are illustrated by an occurrence in Biala, West Galicia, where, last month, thousands of men and women assembled in front of a church and waited all day in the expectation of seeing the devil appear in tangible and visible form. The report had become current that he had been caught in a tight place by a clever priest, who had subdued him with holy water and prayer, and that, loaded with twelve chains, and in the custody of four gendarmes, he would hav to visit twenty-nine churches before he could regain his liberty.

AT the dedication of the New Second Reformed church, Albany, a hymn which had been written for the occasion by a brother, was sung. The first verse was as follows:

"Our father's God, from out whose hand
The centuries fall like grains of sand—
We meet to-day, united, free,
And loyal to our church and thee,
To thank thee for the era done,
And trust thee for the opening one."

By a strange coincidence Whittier wrote precisely the same thing for the opening of the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia, except that the word "land" was substituted for "church."

BEECHER'S revival came to an end a week ago. It has been without marked results, and is looked upon as a failure. There was no widespread interest awakened, and Beecher himself was several times unable to conceal his disappointment. He said a few days ago that there had not been a single note of joy throughout the services. At the close of Friday evening's meeting, when an opportunity was offered to those who had been influenced by the meeting to present themselvs to the examining committee with a view of becoming members of the church, one young woman presented herself to be questioned.

THE Rev. W. M. Thayer says that a man who drinks wine is thereby prejudiced to such an extent that he is disqualified for translating the Bible. It seems then to require a more sober condition to translate a Bible than to write one. By referring to 2 Esdras xvi, 38, it will be seen that the prophet was commanded to open his mouth and drink a cupful of liquid like fire (which was probably whisky), and after he had drank it his mouth was opened and his five scribes wrote sacred scriptures continuously for forty days, writing in that time two hundred and four books. That fiery liquid seems to hav been essential to the operation.

THE church to which belonged the Rev. Edward Cowley, late of the Shepherd's Fold, and later of the penitentiary, has all along been slow in his case. It gave him countenance long after the exposure of his offenses; it provided clergymen to sit with him in court and thereby giv him a kind of public indorsement; and some kindly persons among its members shortened his imprisonment by paying his fine. Now, after he had been judicially tried, convicted, and punished, an ecclesiastical commission of inquiry has at last been appointed to investigate. This body naturally does not at this late day get any help from those who hav once done the work of sending Cowley to prison.

A RELIGIOUS paper givs its readers a picture of the devil with a view of having it used as a blackboard exercise in Sunday-schools. The enemy of souls is represented as black, covered with scales, and furnished with a barbed tail, which he flourishes as a stage driver does his whip lash. His feet are cloven and one leg is much longer than the other. He is represented in twofold view, once as pushing a Christian into mischief, and again as pulling either the same Christian or another one away from the calls of duty. The Christian whom the devil pushes has had his hat knocked off in the encounter. The man who is pulled is grasped by the coat tail, at which the devil appears to be violently jerking as if he would tear the garment to ribbons.

CHAPTER IV.

Abbé Dillon had long since strained our expectation toward that point, and the more so as he was, in spite of his liberal views in church matters of faith, an example of sincere piety, and, notwithstanding his old age, cheerfulness personified. The whole country around venerated the old man; but no one knew him better than the unfortunate and the children, for he loved best to be with them. He had the most singular ability to find out the woe of the one with whom he became acquainted; his look, which glided over the face of the stranger, was sufficient to detect the man, and in a short, apparently unimportant, conversation to penetrate his inmost being. Every sufferer found in the excellent man not only a consoler, a sympathizing friend, but the real companion of his own misfortunes. One sooner felt himself at home than acquainted with him, and when he taught, we believed to hear from his lips not his but our own thoughts and secret desires more definitly arranged and more clearly presented.

He accordingly began his narrativ, and said: "In my youth I was a wild fellow, and would hav liked to become a soldier. Man then feels himself swelling with power, and sets himself up against the world of the Almighty, and fancies to be a match at the same time for the powers of heaven and hell. But my parents did not agree with me. They hated earthly war, but loved more that of the spirit against the powers of darkness. They consequently dedicated me a soldier of Christ on earth, and I, with childlike resignation to their will, carried out the wish of the gray-haired couple, and entered the clerical profession.

"I devoted myself thereto—that is, my whole being was soon absorbed by it. A youth, with glowing fancy, does nothing by halves. My ambition, without hope, to shake the world through arms, now dreamed to fill all churches of Christendom with the glory of sanctity. I became a religious enthusiast. Solitude, and the quiet splendor of the monastery in which I lived, the reading of the church history, of the persecutions of the Christians, of the suffering of our saints and martyrs, inflamed me. I looked upon the world as a large church, in which God himself was the high-priest. Love completed my pious folly. I made the acquaintance of a young lady, whose beauty charmed me, whose bashful friendship drew a paradise around my solitude. I made a sacrifice of love and my wounded heart. So I fancied to hav made the first step toward brotherhood with all saints. While I saw heaven smile upon me, I felt flattered by the dreams of a hopelessly loving young girl. How great, how cleansed from the gross matter of this earth, I felt myself! I wanted now to enter into an order of monks. But my parents kept me back. I became a secular priest, and soon received through the influence of my relativs a well-paying parish.

"No sooner was I living without the walls of the monastery than the enthusiasm of my extreme piety vanished. I found the turmoil of a large seaport more agreeable than the leaden monotony of the sacred walls. My ambition remained the same; it only changed the aim. I determined to become one of the first scholars and authors of our century and of all coming centuries. I had selected the far-extending fields of theology and philosophy for my battlefield. My first work was intended to be the impenetrable ægis of revealed religion against all attacks of doubt and mockery.

"I read, I meditated, I wrote, and before I was aware of it I found myself standing with my weapons turned upon the tabernacle which I had undertaken to defend. The corruptions which had pervaded the church made me suspicious of the church, and the church finally made me mistrust religion. So I became a prodigal son thereof. I at length would for my own consolation erect a new structure out of the ruins of the fallen one. Vain attempt! These ruins, what were they? Ancient prejudices from the childhood days of the human race; tattered delusions, broken-down hopes. My peace, my happiness, was gone. I bewailed the peace of my innocent childhood, ransacked in vain the rubbish of my dreams, cursed in vain my audacious undertaking to penetrate the secrets of the spiritual world. There I lay, miserable and crushed, like the giants under their rocks, who, dissatisfied with this earth, would open for themselvs a way into the realms of the gods.

"For light I had striven, and now found myself in endless darkness. I would draw nearer to God, but at my approach it seemed that he had left this chaotic universe. Where I formerly, with reverential awe, imagined his presence, I found nothing but dead remains of self-consuming nature. I wanted to draw the veil from eternity, and stared into an endless grave, wherein lay the silence of destruction, and all darkening forgetfulness.

"No effort was spared to rescue me from my despairing wisdom. I searched for truth. Only truth, full conviction, indisputable knowledge, could satisfy me, not probability, not uncertain opinion and fickle belief. I examined the whole circle of my experiences, my sad researches, hoping always finally to discover an error which might overthrow my disconsolate wisdom, and lead me back into the lovely old realms. In vain! The terrible certainty remained that I must continue in eternal darkness.

"'What is the world?' asked I, and found myself again at the narrow limits of human wisdom. I see colors, forms, and changes, I hear sound, I feel hardness and softness of things, which I call bodies, and yet I do not know the things, but only their outside, their effect upon my skin, my nerves. I see masks, but not the actors behind them; I see phenomena, but not their cause. Is this outside of the things a property thereof? Or is it a result of the incomprehensible construction of my senses? This again I know not. For the slightest change in my sensual organs changes the world; one sense more, and before me arises a new world.

"And these, my senses, what are they? How can I through these skins, tubes, muscles, and fluids come to a clear conception of the things that float without? How can you turn the sensual into the spiritual, the real into the imaginary? Is the harmony which I find throughout the world property of that which is hid behind the phenomena which I call bodies, and which I distinguish after their impression upon my nerves, or is it the working of those tubes, muscles, and fluids? Or the result of the organization of my imagination, which I now call soul, then spirit?

"What is my soul? Here I meet the same difficulty as before regarding the objects of the sensual world. I know my own existence only through acts or various kinds. What I am myself, that can produce all these, I again know not. My spirit is an invisible fountain; I see streams of my deeds flow forth, without knowing from whence they come. I am the savage, without looking-glass, who knows the forms of all his friends, except his own, which he has never seen.

"What a confusion! I am, without knowing who I am, in connection with things that I do not know. And why am I thus? Why not different? How came I as a part to this universe? Was there a time when I was nothing? Who drew me forth to self-consciousness? What shall I do on this mysterious stage?

"Questions, eternal questions, to which no response is given. I cannot fathom my existence; nor whether I hav been placed here with my own self as an object in view, or as a means for strange, dark purposes. I am forced into this universe, and must now remain here, without knowing whether I can ever free myself from it by my own strength. I can destroy the instrument, this body, through which I act and produce appearances; but, in doing so, I hav no certainty whether I hav not with that destroyed the unknown, which causes the acts. I can burn up the wood, but what hav I destroyed? Certainly not the primitiv substance, the being, which showed that outside, that I called wood, but only the shape, the color, the coherence, and I now call the appearance, after the changed form and color, ashes. The primitiv substance remains; I hav not destroyed it, else it could not produce other phenomena.

"There I stand, uncertain whether I am able to free myself from the universe, or whether I must continue to exist? Continue to exist? and what for? Was I with the universe from eternity—why do I not know it? And if I continue to exist, shall I know again that I was there? I stagger through impenetrable darkness, and knock everywhere against the iron bars of human understanding. What country lies beyond these limits?

"That the world so appears, as I perceive it, is not because it is so in reality, but because my senses are so constructed that I am compelled to see it as I do. Compelled? How could it be otherwise? I obey in my perceptions laws that I did not make for myself. I cannot make myself independent of them. I cannot break the order in which I enjoy all sensations and perceptions. So I fancy to myself everything following in succession, or in time. Time is nothing without me. I smell, feel, taste, hear, and see it not. Time is something within me; and yet not a mere notion, for that could change, but a part of my organization, a law, a form, in which I am forced to let all my ideas succeed each other. Reigns there within the turmoil of my thoughts and sensations, as without in the dark universe, a time, a succession? Is there a past and a future there, or are these both merely formations of my mind? Are both my beginning and end in this universe, or merely in the world of my perceptions?

"And whence comes this world of my perceptions? Who built this strangely interworking machinery, which, without knowing how and what and why it is, only realizes that it runs and thrives and works? Who was its originator? How must it hav been created? Who is the creator's creator? Is it necessary that all things should hav a beginning? What was before the beginning of the universe? Are not beginning, creation, cause, again, perceptions which I gather from the appearances of the poor, sensual world, or of the peculiar organization of my mind? May not the case be with these things quite different than in the narrow circle of ideas of my own self? Why do I bear the idea of a God? Because I cannot explain the mystery of this world without this key. But this key again turns into a mystery; how shall I explain this without a second God? And what hav I then? Where then am I to stop? And there again I knock against the barrier of my reason; I cannot escape from the magic circle in which I am confined.

"So, beloved ones, I staggered from doubts to doubts. I lost myself in a desert. I saw a world full of idolized impostors and their victims; the whole human race in delusions about itself. The deeds of kings and their heroes resembled fearful ragings; the works of philosophers and theologians, childish fables. I saw millions of knees bend before altars, before an unknown being, whose existence was not even guaranteed by reason. I saw millions of hearts break in death with the hope that the breath of the Almighty would again gather and warm their scattered dust for more beautiful worlds.

"And yet all these, who smiled and died in their error, were, perhaps, happy. How willingly, cried I often, would I giv all my wisdom for your dreams. For me, too, nature once bloomed in her splendor; and her beauty was animated, and an angelic spirit spoke to me out of her wonders. Not in vain the transparent dome spanned itself above me, and floated in it the beautiful stars. Every star, to me at that time a more beautiful world, shone full of mysterious meaning down into the tears of the inhabitants of this earth; and a foreboding of the eternal and eternal-recompensing breathed through the firmament and over the shuddering earth and on the glowing hearts. And when the spring morning kindled the skies and colored the mountains, and the valleys awoke with the warbling of the lark, when the song of awakened creatures swelled up toward heaven, my knees bent in joy, and I would pray in the dust, hundreds of flowers waving around my head, and my tears intermingled with the dew of the rose. Ah! then it sounded from the depths and from the hights: God is eternal love. At that time I still strewed flowers upon the graves, and called the coffin the cradle of the second life. And the first tear of grief that fell upon the loved dead one was at the same time the first tear of love and longing, soon to be again united with him, where no sigh moves the weary bosom, and blissfulness reigns without end.

"And see, my beloved ones," continued Dillon, "I was very happy. But I endeavored to lift myself up, and to bear with manly courage a fate which I believed myself unable to change. Without knowing whether there was a ruling god, and immortality my lot, I honored the laws of virtue and felt in their keeping now and then some consolation. In this frame of mind it was that I found myself in Toulon, and there it was that I made the acquaintance of the man who restored to me my lost peace."

TO BE CONTINUED.

In the North American Review for April is a noteworthy article by Judge A. W. Tourgee, in which the professed reformers of the civil service are put on the defensiv and their schemes of reform pronounced to be incompatible with American ideas of self-government and on divers other grounds inadmissible and impracticable. The same number of the Review contains, under the fanciful title, "The Thing that Might Be," a profoundly philosophical study of the laws and conditions of human progress, by the Rev. Mark Pattison, rector of Lincoln College, Oxford. The third article is a strong defense of the Roman Catholic side of the controversy about religion in the public schools, from the pen of Bishop McQuade, of Rochester. The great problem of the governmental control of monopolies is discussed with reference to railway management by the Hon. Geo. Ticknor Curtis, who contends that when a railway company is incorporated by any state it agrees to this much and no more, that its property shall be subject to such legislativ control as the act of incorporation embraces, to the exercise of the taxing and police powers of the state, and to the power of eminent domain. The same problem, in its bearing upon telegraph lines, is ably discussed by the Hon. Wm. M. Springer. Mr. John Fiske has an article on the "Historic Genesis of Protestantism," and Mr. Anthony Trollope an essay on the poet Longfellow. Mr. Desiré Charnay, the author of the series of papers on the ruined cities of Central America, has for more than two months been pursuing his researches in regions remote from all avenues of communication with the civilized world, and consequently neither the present number of the Review nor the one last preceding it contains any contribution from him. In the May number, however, will be published another of his very instructiv papers.

No work is more appreciated by the scholar than Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man."

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

VII.—The Deluge.

TEXT.—And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male aud female.—Genesis vi, 19.

We are now approaching, according to the plan of our discourses, a great—a wonderful—event in the annals of the world, greater and more wonderful in many respects than any other which has been or will be unfolded in the narrativ of the sacred writers as we proceed in our orderly discussion.

The text is introductory to the story of the flood, when the entire earth was submerged by a forty days' rain-fall, so that the highest mountains under the whole heavens were covered, and every living substance was destroyed. This rain poured down in such volumes continuously for forty days that the whole surface of the globe was buried under a body of water which had accumulated at the astounding rate of over four and a half inches every minute during the entire period.

No such rain has ever been known in modern times.

Nor was any such ever known in ancient times, except to devotees of various sects who believed the story as a part of their respectiv religions.

To-day, however, we do not propose to consider the flood itself; but only a relativ topic which the text presents.

We hav here another evidence of the whimsical and weak nature of the Jewish God. He seems to hav cherished his resentment against Adam for the unfortunate apple business for generations, and to hav permitted the subject to weigh upon his mind to that extent that he could see nothing but corruption in the human race.

He accordingly determined to destroy it from the earth. But he nevertheless retained such an affection for Noah that he made an exception in his case. It will strike the candid reader as a remarkable weakness in administering justice that he should hav made that exception. If the race was corrupt, Noah and his family must hav been tainted. In fact, corruption of their posterity proves that they were. This exception made the deluge a mere slaughter, accomplishing no good purpose. Had the whole race perished and a new creation after improved models or designs been made, the resulting good would hav excused the heartless destruction. But the only justifiable object of the flood was defeated by the rescue of Noah and his family.

There does not appear to hav been any necessity for destroying the animals, which, with only one exception, had done no harm to their creator. Yet the threat was to destroy "all flesh wherein is the breath of life." This, however, was thought better of in time; for, besides Noah and his family, provision was made for saving a male and female from every species of animal and reptil. Even the serpent tribe was preserved. The Lord "went back" upon himself. He did not destroy "all flesh" wherein was the breath of life, as he had threatened.

As near as the divine whim can be fathomed, it was the creator's intention to destroy the work of his hands, and make a fresh start. But he must hav distrusted his ability to create another race of living things, even of the humblest kind, which would account for the preservation of Noah with his family and two of a kind of all other flesh. But if he possessed the omniscience with which he is credited, he ought to hav seen that the whole object of his freshet would be frustrated if he permitted the repopulation of the earth to be accomplished by propagation from the species that lived before the deluge.

It was a very short-sighted proceeding, and, as the result proves, a mere useless slaughter, which it is little less than libelous to charge upon a really beneficent supreme being.

TEXT.—In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights.—Genesis vii, 11, 12.

The idea of a great deluge is borrowed by the sacred writer from other religions. Nearly every religion whose traditions are now known, and whose origin was in the East and antedates that of the Hebrews, has an account of a flood, differing only slightly in detail from the story in Genesis.

The tradition apparently had a poetic origin. But it was reduced by the Jews to the commonest of commonplace prose, in which shape it is accepted by the Christian world as a divinely inspired account of an actual occurence.

But as that intellectual shackle of priestcraft—faith—is removed from the minds of men, and they enter the domain of theology with the same freedom of thought with which they investigate other subjects, belief in the flood dies out. It is difficult now to find any but the most case-hardened theologian or his most ignorant devotee who will seriously pretend that any such event ever transpired.

Belief in the story of the deluge presupposes a belief that no rainbow existed prior to the destruction of the world by water. It presupposes that the ark could accommodate a pair of every animal and reptil. It presupposes that this happy family lived a year in a huge box without ventilation, sanitary conveniences, or food. It presupposes that there was a reservoir of water held above the earth by a solid firmament. It presupposes that the highest mountains could be covered by water in a storm of forty days' duration. It presupposes that natural laws, in every respect, almost, differed before the flood from what they are now.

The Chaldean account is to the effect that God appeared to a man in a dream and warned him that on the fifteenth of a certain month mankind would be destroyed by a deluge. He directed this favored creature to build a ship to contain himself and his friends, with pairs of all kinds of animal life that could not survive in water. When the earth was submerged birds were sent out, but finding no place to rest they returned. This was twice repeated, and on the third day the birds did not return. Then the Chaldean Noah left the Ark, and with his wife was translated to heaven; but his friends retired to Babylon and rebuilt the city.

According to the Brahmanic faith, the human race had become corrupt, and were destroyed by a deluge, except a pious prince and seven holy men who were saved in a ship.

Compared with these traditions the Jewish Bible is a modern production. That the Jews learned these traditions from the people who surrounded them there can be no doubt, and that the story is plagiarized there ought to be none.

That such a flood as we find described in the book of these religions never occurred no one can deny without believing that that epoch marked a radical change in the unalterable laws of nature.

Read in the light of reason the story is like a nursery tale; but Christian doctrin demands implicit faith in its very truth under penalty of eternal torture.

Not long ago, to hav hinted a doubt would hav brought upon the skeptic condign punishment at the hands of the priests. More recently still he would hav been ostracized from "good society." Note, then, the progress of the world, when doubts of a ridiculous story may now be expressed without apprehension of that danger to person or reputation which would hav assuredly followed the expression, even in this country, within the recollection of men whose hairs are not yet gray.

Elmina's Alphaism Criticised.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Through the kindness of one of your subscribers I hav had the pleasure of reading a few numbers of your paper, and I assure you I hav been highly entertained in traveling with you through Italy and your return home; in the lively discussion carried on in your paper as to the materiality of thought, and upon the subject of sexual temperance particularly. I believe in temperance in the use of what is good; total abstinence from what is bad.

Elmina D. Slenker cannot impress too forcibly the duty of temperance upon all who value happiness in this life, for sexual intemperance is productiv of untold misery, in wedlock as well as out of it; but when she recognizes the lower use of the sexuality, that of instinct-reproduction, I must beg leave to suggest a wider range for its legitimate exercise in man. Through nearly all the lower species of animals, in which the brain and nervous system are feebly developed, the law as given by O. S. Fowler and taught by Cowan, Mrs. Slenker, and others for man is most strictly obeyed; but the nearer we approach to man in brain development, the more human they become in this respect.

Elmina says, in substance, "We hav practiced the wrong course until it has become second nature." There was a time in the distant past when man, lower than the monkey tribes of to-day, lived out the law as laid down by our advocate of alphaism, but the severity of the law, for the male, was somewhat ameliorated by promiscuity. As a race we hav outgrown alphaism, but hav yet to outgrow promiscuity. Man was or is essentially promiscuous. In the early ages there was no such thing as marriage. Then came polygamy and concubinage; recently we hav been trying the experiment of monogamic marriage, and we hav not been very successful in our efforts, in view of the many divorces, bigamy, and general want of fidelity to the marriage vow; but I think we are rising slowly toward true monogamic marriage, and learning the true uses of sexuality. Now the world is peopling fast enough—"fewer children and better" is the motto for the time—but must sexuality die out by disuse in consequence? Any organ or faculty not used grows smaller, until nature entirely removes it. Curtail parent dogs for three generations, and the pups will become short-tailed.

In all the departments of lower life, vegetable and animal, useless and poisonous weeds and briars, and useless and injurious animals, grow as well as useful ones, apparently unregulated by intellect; bad traits of character grow as naturally among the animals and lower men as good ones in obedience to laws which we understand.

The higher man becomes, the more voluntary he becomes. The art of producing a high order of human beings is taught now with great exacitude by Fowler, John Cowan, M.D., and others, and we know that through the operation of laws well known to us we may make the man of the future just about what we want him to be. If we liv continent we will gradually become sexless, unaffectionate, pale, frigid; men with feminin voices, women with squeaking, cracked voices. The voice shows whether men and women are well-sexed or not, and we can develop man symmetrically from where he now is, or from where the best specimens now are, to an unimagined hight, or we can lop off some redundancy or other, except sex, that threatens the existence of the race. The law of evolution as it regards man is now in the hands of man. Nature furnishes the tools and conditions, and the art is being taught of producing after ideal patterns.

I would suggest wings for the women of the future, but don't prune men any. Are the alphaists in favor of large families, or the New England style of one or two? The Yankees hav concluded to stop the breed. If they think it bad for the world, all right. I suppose it will result in the survival of the fittest, but the indications are that the lower races and families are furnishing the population. If alphaism is adopted, and the New England rule, it must be so; for all who adopt them will become, in time, sexless. The man of small amativness is effeminate and useless. The strong men of the world hav been well-sexed; instance Martin Luther, George Washington, Aaron Burr, Daniel Webster, and Henry Ward Beecher.

Elmina's system would bring upon the stage a weakly race void of affection, the soul and center of the social system around which cluster and revolve the little planets and satellites of home, and in whose light all bask and are happy.

No, Elmina, sexuality, guided by reason and the intuitions, has another use than reproduction. It is electro-magnetic and vitalizing in its higher normal and temperate use, which is above instinct. This seems a just inference from the fact that this higher use is only found in animal habits among the highly organized for the transmission of magnetic fluid through a fine brain and nervous system, whereas in the lower orders instinct always practices alphaism. James C. Jackson, M.D., in his "Sexual Organism and its Healthful Management," in a chapter all ought to read, page 258, says, "I am satisfied from a thorough study of the organic relation of the sexes that the faculty of amativness has a twofold purpose and should be always gratified by either sex from this point." I might bring many authorities to support this position, but as we are not authoritarians the above will suffice. "And there be eunuchs which hav made themselvs eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake" (Matt. xix, 12), said Jesus; but as my kingdom is of this world, I am anti-ascetic and anti-monastic, laboring with Elmina for temperance and every other reform calculated to ennoble man and make all better and happier, and am opposed to all that would in any way injure or degrade my race. If Elmina would level her artillery against abuse and intemperance alone she would not provoke the thought and discussion she now does. Extremists are our leaders.

Obituary.

Death has again entered our midst and taken from among us one of our most activ and earnest Liberals. James Johnson committed suicide on March 3d, at his home in Wolcott, N. Y. The circumstances which led to the rash act were failing health and financial embarrassment. His funeral was held at his home on Sunday, March 6th, under the auspices of the Liberals of that part of the county. The services were conducted by Samuel Cosad, consisting of an able eulogy to the memory of our departed brother. Bro. Johnson had been a lifelong and able defender of the principles of Freethought. He died as he had lived. He had always stood foremost in the rank of Liberals, and wherever duty called he promptly obeyed the summons, giving liberally of time and money to advance a cause which was indeed dear to him, withstanding persecution (not a little) manfully and heroically. The large concourse of friends, especially Liberals, who gathered together to pay their last earthly tribute bore unmistakable evidence of the great loss they had sustained by his death. All join in an expression of sympathy for the bereaved family, who hav sustained an irreparable loss in being called upon to bid a final adieu to a kind husband, a loving and an affectionate father.

Editorial.

Business.—Personal.

I wish to do what good I can, especially when I can do so with some profit to myself. With this motiv, and believing that William Wilson's magnetic garments are doing much good and are capable of doing far more good, I hav accepted an agency for their sale.

For several months I hav carefully watched their effect upon those who hav used them. It has come to my knowledge that hundreds of persons in this vicinity hav used them within the past eight months with astonishing benefit. I hav taken some pains to ascertain, and hav not learned of a single case, where they hav been used according to directions that they hav not done good.

Numerous paralytics who were helpless and worse than dead hav been marvelously restored to comfort and usefulness. Rheumatism, sciatica, lumbago, stiffened joints, inactiv limbs, catarrh of the head or lungs, debility, defectiv circulation, and a long list of kindred ailments seem to yield to their influence in a wonderful manner. Mr. Wilson regards disease as a unit, and considers that the remedy to produce health is also a unit. This may not be so to the fullest extent, but that it is far more so than is commonly supposed there are the best reasons for believing.

One of the great advantages of this remedy is that it renders unnecessary the swallowing of the long list of cathartics, laxativs, aperients, astringents, alterativs, resolvents, purifiers, hepatics, tonics, stimulants, excitants, stomachics, carminativs, demulcents, nervins, sedativs, soporifics, opiates, diuretics, diaphoretics, expectorants, emetics, and the entire catalog of thousands of drugs and medicins, including simples and compounds of the vegetable, mineral, and animal kingdoms, which mankind has been gulping down for thousands of years. One of the great absurdities which man has been guilty of is the constant and persistent swallowing of nearly all conceivable substances, and making of the stomach a regular drug shop or foul chemical laboratory. Whatever tends to abate and terminate this absurd custom is a blessing.

For forty years of my life I hav been engaged in preparing, selling, and dispensing medicins. Probably not less than a hundred tons of drugs hav been in my possession, and made up in the form of mixtures, decoctions, tinctures, powders, pills, etc., to be taken into the human stomach. I meant well in all this, but fear I was in the dark, and not pursuing the best system of imparting health.

The impositions that hav been passed off upon suffering humanity in the way of medical compounds are almost inconceivable. Thousands of tons of drugs are sent from this city every year all over the country and are eagerly swallowed by the afflicted millions, and not unfrequently with positivly injurious results. Many of these drugs are positivly deleterious and hav taken thousands upon thousands of lives. Medicins hav done much good and hav often relieved suffering and disease, but they hav also done much harm. They hav often poisoned the human system and shortened life. Whether medicins hav not done more harm than good is one of the great questions not fully solved. That drugs hav done an untold and unknown amount of injury is true—too true. Let every person dispense with them who can.

The simple elements and forces of nature are the sources of health, the promoters of happiness, and when gently and properly administered, the best remedial agents. Sunlight, pure air, pure water, and the magnetic fluid are nature's great remedies, and in restoring health are far better than all the vegetable and mineral poisons pounded together in mortars, ground in mills, or manipulated in chemists' laboratories and apothecaries' shops.

Mr. Wilson states that three thousand people in this vicinity hav already made use of his remedy, and not a single case of failure has yet occurred. A large number hav used it to my own knowledge. That it has restored the glow and cheerfulness of health I hav witnesses, and that it has allayed much pain I hav no reason to doubt. Pain is a great impediment to happiness, and to be freed from it is indeed a great blessing.

The benefit imparted by these magnetic goods is in pursuance of a simple law of nature. There is no miracle about it. Magnetism is known to be the vital principle without which life cannot exist, and with a deficiency of it health departs and pain and disease are inevitable. In these goods are small plates of sheet steel riveted together with another metal, thus forming minute batteries, and being thoroughly magnetized by a powerful magnet, by being worn near the body they impart to the system that vital magnetic fluid which is the source of life and health, the deficiency of which produces disease, and the absence of which causes death. The mode of cure is simple and perfectly safe. Nature is always simple, and it is invariably safe to follow her. These magnetic garments may be regarded as nature's remedy.

The appliances are strongly recommended for nervous diseases, nervous debility, spinal disease, paralysis, epilepsy, rheumatism, acute or chronic, stiffened joints, anchylosis, loss of action of any part, catarrh, even in its worst forms, settled coughs, bronchitis, asthma, heart disease, torpidity of the liver and bowels, constipation, headache, cold feet, imperfect circulation, depressed spirits, gloominess, melancholy, hysteria, female weaknesses, and the numerous class of ailments akin to these, or arising from a debilitated and diseased condition of the system.

They will not, of course, perform impossibilities; they will not restore a limb that has been amputated; they will not restore an eye that has been put out; they will not bring an absolutely dead person to life, but they will cure very many diseases, they will aid enfeebled nature in restoring health, they will thus impart much happiness, and they are not unpleasant to wear. Mr. Wilson insists that they will cure every disease save ulcerated or decayed lungs. Incipient consumption yields to their gentle influence.

The first objection raised with regard to these goods is that they are dear; but upon a little consideration this objection is greatly removed. When it is remembered that they last for many years, that they obviate the taking of medicins and the employment of physicians, that they relieve pain and disease and restore good health, it will be seen that they are not dear. When it is remembered how thousands and millions of dollars hav been paid for medical treatment, and too often with little or no benefit, these appliances will not be found dear. Though the expense comes all at one time, and at first, it is not great in proportion to the benefit imparted; they are far, far cheaper and pleasanter than the old method of treating disease.

The prices are as follows:

Nerve and Lung Invigorators	$16 00
Body Belts	16 00
Throat Protectors	4 00
Chest Protectors	8 00
Insoles, per pair	2 50
Spine Bands	9 00
Sciatica Appliances	12 50
Knee Caps	7 00
Leg Belts	10 00
Anklets	7 00
Shoulder Appliances	12 50
Wristlets, each	7 00
Caps for the head	10 00
Abdominal Belts	24 00
Rupture Supporters	24 00

These are prices for goods of the best quality for adults. For children and infants the prices are considerably less. The number of appliances to be worn must be decided upon according to the necessities of the case. A supply inadequate to the cure of the case will not be sent out.

Letters of inquiry may be addressed to the undersigned, and will receive due attention. Orders for the goods will be promptly filled. A description of the diseases should be given, and in ordering goods the size of the waist and the size of shoes worn should be stated.

The goods will be sent by express to all places within a thousand or fifteen hundred miles, or they can be sent by mail to localities at a great distance, or where express offices are too far away.

My object in accepting this agency is to do good by affording benefit to my suffering fellow-beings and to myself at the same time. D. M. Bennett.

Communications for The Truth Seeker.

Many contributors hav apparent grounds for dissatisfaction because their contributions do not more promptly appear. The reason of this is easily explained. Three or four times as many articles are sent us as we can find room for. We would gladly publish every good article we receive, but find it utterly impossible. There are certain articles which we wish to lay before our readers, and in addition to these we will giv the contributions of friends so far as possible. We do not see how we can do more with our present space. We ask friends to be as patient as possible, and to make their communications as brief as the pressing nature of their inspiration will admit of. Let us all cultivate patience and resignation.

Book Notice.

History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200. By Charles B. Waite. Chicago: G. V. Waite & Co. 450 pages.

Under the above title Judge C. B. Waite has compiled and written a work which throws a great amount of light upon the early history of Christianity, and which is destined to be read by many thousands of people. While it is a bold attack upon the doctrins and claims of the church, it is written with candor and truth, and without bitterness or acrimony. It is the result of many years of thorough investigation and the most elaborate research among all the ancient authorities pertaining to this important subject. Two years of the time was spent in the Library of Congress at Washington, which is especially rich in biblical literature, and where are the writings of all the early Fathers in the original and an immense collection of later writers.

It is not saying too much to pronounce it a complete record of the events connected with the Christian religion during the first two centuries of its existence. That period has been divided into six periods—the First Period, the Apostolic Age, from the year 30 to 80; the Second Period, the Apostolic Fathers, from 80 to 120; the Third Period, the Three Apocryphal Gospels, 120 to 130; the Fourth Period, Forty Years of Christian Writers, from 130 to 170; the Fifth Period, the Four Canonical Gospels, from 170 to 185; the Sixth Period, from 185 to 200.

A comprehensiv view is given of the gospels of the first two centuries, with a brief sketch of those of a later date. The comparisons which the Judge has instituted between the canonical gospels and those styled apocryphal is a peculiar and interesting feature of the work, and one which will prove of great importance in arriving at a correct estimate of the value of the gospels as a whole.

This work is compiled with the accuracy of an able legal mind, and makes clear and conclusiv the important fact that the principal part of the books of the New Testament were not written by the persons whose names they bear, and that in this particular a great imposition has been palmed off upon the world, and the sacredness of inspired writings, produced by the agency of certain revered saints, has been accorded to that which was produced by theological charlatans and impostors.

In this work every authority and writer, ancient and modern, is arranged and classified, so that there can be no difficulty in appreciating the full importance of the authors quoted. The investigation is carried on step by step, so that the reader can easily take in where invention and pretense took the place of fact.

This work is necessarily very damaging to the extravagant claims of orthodoxy; but as truth is what the world needs and demands, it is to be hoped this production of Judge Waite may meet with a large sale. Let every person who prizes reality above fiction, truth above falsehood, read this volume. Price, cloth, $2.50; full sheep, library style, $3.50. Orders may be addressed to this office.

James A. Bliss has opened a Liberal and Spiritual book depot at 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia. He keeps on hand a full line of our publications, and Radical and Spiritual works generally. He also keeps The Truth Seeker and other reform and progressiv papers for sale, and will cheerfully take subscriptions for the same. May he meet with the success which his enterprise and industry merit.

The Espionage of the Mails.

The recent appearance of Mr. Anthony Comstock at Albany, for the purpose of getting a bill through the legislature authorizing him to search houses without a warrant, brings to mind that this same man is now exercising an authority of a most obnoxious character. We refer to his espionage over the mails.

A scrutiny of mail matter was insisted upon many years ago, when Amos Kendall was postmaster-general, in the interest of the slave-holders, who wished to exclude from the mails all abolition or antislavery publications.

The old man eloquent, John Quincy Adams, was then in Congress, and never did that illustrious man protest against any outrage more strenuously than he did against this.

If the mails may be overhauled on one pretext, they may be on another. Anthony Comstock is an autocrat national spy, with subordinates to aid him in the detestable work of sifting the matter which shall be allowed to pass through the public mails.

The British people would not quietly submit to such a state of things for a single week.

"An Infidel Abroad."

The following rather flattering notice is from the Sunday Capitol, of Columbus, Ohio:

The progress of Infidelity in America can with certainty be laid at the doors of two men, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, the orator, and D. M. Bennett, the writer. The former sways a terrible influence by his fiery eloquence, but the latter is, without doubt, the strongest and ablest leader of the two, for, though he is not as passionately brilliant in his fights as the daring Bob, he is a man of cooler, steadier judgment, and what he does giv to the world bears so much the stronger and wider sway on account of the great amount of meat he givs to the kernel, the terrible amount of undeniable matter of fact he puts within a small space. Mr. Bennett's writings hav been the terror of the Christian for some eight years, and many are the attempts made to stop the progress of this Infidel. But so far the Christian world has only met with failures in its attempts to crush Bennett. He is not the man to be crushed in a moment. Over two years ago he was sent to prison by a misguided jury for selling a work that did not please the good Christian world, but this failed to cool off the enterprising Infidel, and now thousands of indignant Christians are astonished with the news that Bennett has just brought out another work, entitled 'An Infidel Abroad,' a book of some eight hundred and fifty pages, large type, tinted paper, and very handsomely bound, all for $1.50. Here we hav for the first time Europe painted on a large canvas before us by an Infidel, and from an Infidel standpoint. Bennett sees things as no American traveler before him has seen things, and the views he givs on them are so different, so terribly daring above anything we ever had from our travelers abroad, that the book is really a rich treat to those who are dying for something in the way of literature. Space forbids us to giv a review of the book. There are some things in it that we do not like and some truths that might just as well hav been left out; but, on the whole, the work is a striking one, and is bound to attract the attention of theologians and literary critics."

The Brooklyn Rain-Makers.

Among the nativ African tribes the rain-maker is usually a more important person than the king. The latter has, it is true, the power of life and death over his subjects, but his jurisdiction is purely earthly. On the other hand, the rain-maker is believed to be able to control the elements. It is the rain-maker who alone in popular estimation is able to send rain or to withhold it as his interest or caprice may dictate. As rain is often the only security against famin in Africa, the man who rules the clouds is necessarily a person of immense importance. In the dry season he receives large quantities of cattle, slaves, and other retaining fees from people who are anxious for rain, and after a satisfactory shower popular gratitude takes the form of more slaves and cattle. It must be admitted that when the rain-maker fails to produce rain he is sometimes killed in order to stimulate the rain-making fraternity to a more careful and zealous discharge of their duty, but in spite of this, the rain-maker is, on the whole, decidedly the most enviable of all his darky countrymen in point of worldly ease and prosperity. Of course, men who believe that a fantastically dressed mountebank can control the rain are dreadfully ignorant and degraded, and, of course, the rain-maker himself is a blasphemous impostor, but, after all, it may be fairly asked whether there is not a close parallel between the performances of the African rain-makers and certain so-called religious antics now in progress in Brooklyn.

The belief in revivals of religion is shared by many sects who are widely apart in other respects. The ardent Methodist who witnessed the revivals in which Wesley and Whitefield were prominent held the same belief as to revivals which was held by the cold New England Calvinists. They regarded a revival as nothing less than a miracle. It was believed to be distinctly and purely the work of the Holy Spirit, and was classed with the miracle of the Pentecost. In early New England days, when every New Englander was either a theologian or an outcast, no one pretended that a revival could be originated by any man or body of men. The suggestion that any eminent preacher could fix a date for a revival, and could bring it about on the specified day, would hav been regarded as an atrocious piece of blasphemy. Granting that genuin revivals do take place, and that they are purely the work of the Holy Spirit, it is evident that the pretense that any man, no matter how eloquent he may be, can command the descent of the Holy Spirit is blasphemy of the most shocking type. A minister who should claim, directly or indirectly, such a power, would be making a claim far more audacious than that of the African rain-maker who simply claims power over the material clouds.

Recently two well-known Brooklyn preachers announced that they proposed to hav a revival in their respectiv so-called churches. One of them was a man, who, by a disagreement of a jury, had narrowly escaped conviction of the crime of adultery, and who had lost the confidence of the great majority of the members of his own sect. The other was a vulgar seeker after notoriety, against whom charges of lying and perjury had been made by ministers of unblemished character. Of one of these men decency requires that he should keep himself in comparativ retirement. Of the other it would be too much to expect that the requirements of decency would hav any weight with him. These are the men who hav undertaken to bring about revivals of religion in their several places of entertainment, and who are now redeeming their promises in a characteristic way. Just as the rain-maker conjures the clouds with rude chanting and with wild gestures, so the two Brooklyn revival-makers seek to produce revivals by the singing of peculiar hymns and by shouting and crying. To the man who does not believe that revivals are anything more than seasons of nervous excitement the spectacle is a sad and painful one, while to the man who does believe in the Pentecostal character of a true revival the deliberate assumption that the awful third person of the trinity can be brought down to Brooklyn by the antics of Beecher and Talmage is unspeakably blasphemous and revolting.

There are good people, who, not perceiving the full meaning of a pretended revival, systematically worked up by two Brooklyn rain-makers, fancy that in some way good may result, and that, at any rate, the "revival" should not be spoken against. Instead of doing good such a "revival" must do incalculable harm. Its inevitable result is to bring religion into contempt in the eyes of men who do not separate Christianity from the follies and faults of its professors. Moreover, the condition of the man or woman who fancies that he or she is converted under the bellowings of Beecher and the dancing of Talmage is not to be viewed with complacency by believers in true religion. Sooner or later such converts will discover that they hav mistaken physical excitement for that renewal of the desires and impulses which is the first step in the Christian life. They will think that they hav tried religion thoroughly, and know by experience that it is a delusion. Or else they will persevere in their Christian professions, and will model their code of morals and conduct on those of the reverend rain-makers to whom their conversion is due. In either case they are recruits from whom Christianity has more to dread than from its open enemies.

The Mormon Problem.

How Mormonism is to be eliminated from the republic while the Christian church is subsidized and the Bible is authorized as a school book, is the problem with which our statesmen are now puzzling and struggling. It is insoluble.

Polygamy is surely abominable. But it is a Bible institution. Abraham and Solomon, on the average, were deeper in it than Brigham Young. The Mormon church is decidedly orthodox. It believes in Christ, his atonement, resurrection, and kingdom, here and hereafter. If its Christianity is not Platonic, it is sufficiently Ebionitic. Contradictory as the two sects are, they are both in the New Testament. Mormonism grew naturally out of both the Old and New Testaments, and all Christendom receives both books as divine.

Judge C. C. Goodwin, in the March number of the North American Review, presents the "political attitude" of Mormonism as something rather portentous. And truly it is. But who is to blame for it? Could it possibly hav arisen in a republic which did not cherish and cultivate a superstitious regard for the Hebrew scriptures and that gospel which sends one man to hell and another to heaven simply because the former is rich and the latter poor? How are the statesmen to punish for polygamy while the Sunday-schools are teaching that Abraham, a polygamist, and a very mean one at that, was the father of the faithful and a model of godliness? Are they to be hounded on to exterminate Mormonism by the church of which it is the legitimate, natural, and inevitable offspring? Is Saturn again to devour his own children? Is the church to hav the use of the civil bayonet to pick the mote of excessiv marriage out of the Mormon brother's eye, while it has the beam of the holy Bible Society in its own?

Considering on what slight evidence in its favor, and against what glaring proofs of imposture against it, the world believes in the divine inspiration of the Bible, it seems quite possible that the very concoctors of Mormonism may have sincerely believed they were commissioned by God to form a new church, or rather reform the old one. Remember that the early fathers of the Christian church advocated lying for the cause of Christ. Joe Smith was doubtless habitually a liar; but he found nothing in the Ten Commandments against lying, so long as he did not bear false witness against a neighbor.

As to the "crafty brain of Sidney Rigdon," I think Judge Goodwin is mistaken as to the character of the man. I knew him when he was studying Latin with Rev. John Seward, a brother-in-law of mine, in Aurora, Ohio, with a view to obtain a college education for the ministry. My impression is that he was a perfectly sincere zealot who believed every word of the Bible divinely inspired. He had a fanatical faith as well as an activ brain. And when he got hold of Spaulding's time-worn manuscript of a novel in Robert Patterson's printing-office in Pittsburgh, he would be very likely to think it a missiv of divine Providence to enable him to fulfil his mission of reforming the church and converting the world. And when he met with such a magnetic, natural-born liar as Joe Smith, in Palmyra, N. Y., and showed him Spaulding's work, it was the most natural thing in the world that the two should convert each other. So that Smith, hitherto a lazy, drunken vagabond, should think himself called of God henceforth to lie like St. Hieronymus for his glory, and Rigdon that he had by the direction of divine Providence found a man who could not only see through a stone into the bowels of the earth, but grind by God's will that strange, old, unprinted novel into a genuin revelation on which to found the church of the Latter Day Saints.

From what I saw later, after the Mormon tabernacle was set up in Kirtland, I hav little doubt that Rigdon sincerely believed Smith a prophet. He was that gullible, to use a Pennsylvania phrase. Cowdery and Harris, whom I often met, had every appearance of being sincere dupes. Smith, I think, duped himself. Surely it is not an impossible thing that a liar should be superstitious, or that a superstitious person should sincerely think himself called or inspired of God.

In the constitution of his church Rigdon introduced some good features, such as not bestowing any earthly advantages on its officers, and giving women equality of suffrage with the men in all offices, spiritual and temporal. The former he may hav borrowed of the Quakers, and the latter, I think, he must hav borrowed from the practice of the Congregational churches on the Western Reserve, with which he was familiar. The state might well borrow that, and it will probably hav to before the Mormon problem is settled. It is true that the Mormon church, like the Christian, gave a fat thing to its officers, and this was the cause of Rigdon's temporary quarrel with it.

The causes that hav produced the elevation of woman, so far as she is elevated, and the consecration of home, are not to be found in the code of Moses or the epistles of Paul. Theology has surely had no hand in it. The world must thank science and philosophy, and not theology, for the absence of polygamy in Christendom. Theology tends everywhere to maintain or restore it, because it disparages every earthly home in comparison with the unthinkable, heavenly home, where "they neither marry nor are given in marriage." No thanks to theology that it has not suppressed human nature and earthly happiness altogether. Fortunately, human nature is irrepressible; it will act and think for itself, more or less, in spite of all the allurements and horrors of a future, supernatural, and unknowable world which theology can conjure up. In spite of the glories of Solomon, that wisest of the scripture saints, as the old catechism taught us, in spite of the contempt poured upon marriage by a celibate clergy and their enslaved hordes of monks and nuns, the men and women who hav thought out the sciences of astronomy, anatomy, chemistry, and physiology hav discovered that monogamy—one wife and one husband at a time—is the secret of the highest human happiness, and the only system under which anything like justice, peace, and honorable progress of the race can be secured.

Now the only peaceful solution of the Mormon problem lies in making the morality of public opinion and law paramount to the teachings of the Bible. It lies in a public opinion which shall place a great part of the Bible on a dead level with the book of Mormon, and a large part of its saints on the level of Rigdon and Joe Smith. We hav seen the hallucinations and lies of these men become venerably mythical before our eyes. We hav seen the very stupidest book of the century, when clothed in travesty of Bible style, become "holy writ" to more than one hundred thousand earnest, honest, industrious people. And why should it not? It is not stupider or more monstrous or more foolish than a large part of what the Bible Society publishes. The Bible has considerable wisdom sandwiched in; so has the Book of Mormon. The Bible has the advantage of a good deal of better poetry and terser maxims. Nevertheless, but for the glamor thrown over it by superstition, and the dignity expended on it by the clergy lugging out a text every Sunday in every pulpit, the book as a whole, with its Munchausen histories, its Levitical laws, and its ridiculous, prophetical beasts with seven heads and ten horns, would sink in public estimation even below the Book of Mormon. At any rate, society would only preserve its best passages, as men would fish out diamonds from a cesspool. When the real, knowable nature of things assumes its rightful authority over the consciences of men and women—I mean the men and women who rule society at large, creating its science and its literature—not only polygamy will cease, but the more deplorable commercial degradation of woman, which now disgraces our cities, will cease also.

Thus the solution of the Mormon problem will carry with it that of a more difficult one. The Christian solution, to which the government is urged by the clergy in the name of law, is nothing but persecution—the same system which Nero applied to their own faith, with what success the world knows too well. A bloody solution will be no solution at all.

The missionaries to the Asiatics profess to hav converted polygamists. Has it been by punishment? Do they ever oblige their converts to put away their wives? Do they not, rather by appealing to science and philosophy than to scripture, confine themselvs to preventing polygamy in the future? The managers of the church had better do the same in the United States.

Discussion.

What Objections to Christianity?

MR. MAIR'S SIXTH LETTER.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Notwithstanding your rather spirited defense of Messrs. Inman, Higgins, and Taylor, I must still hold to my assertion that they are worthless as authorities. Neither of them are mentioned in the Encyclopedia Britannica, the American Encyclopedia, nor Chambers', a fact which stamps them as being of no literary or scientific value whatever.

I have made considerable search to find some authoritative biography or criticism of any of the foregoing, but with the exception of two references in Allibone's "Dictionary of Authors," I can find no trace of them. I found there the following criticisms: Of Mr. Higgins' "History of Mohammed," Mr. Edward Upham, author of the "History of Buddhism," says, "I know it to be full of errors." Of the Anacalypsis it quotes the London Athenæum, from which I extract, "Never was there more wildness of speculation than in the attempt to lift the veil of Isis." Probably, however, the most "unkindest cut of all" is its criticism of Robert Taylor's Diegesis. It is, according to Allibone, "ineffably absurd. We can here apply the comment of Gibbon on his verdict respecting the prolix history of Gregory of Tours, 'I have tediously acquired by a painful perusal the right of pronouncing this unfavorable sentence.' It is said that Taylor repented and recanted; all the better for him; the conclusions of such a mind are of little weight on either side of any question."

Add to this Prof. Fiske's criticism of Jacolliot, that his work, "The Bible in India," is "a very discreditable performance," "a disgraceful piece of charlatanry written by a man ignorant of the very rudiments of the subject which he professes to handle." I scarcely need after this to quote Prof. Müller's condemnation of it.

I may be in error in attributing my book to the writer of "Diegesis." I found him set down as its author in the catalogue of Christian authors named in the last pages of Gowan's (1853) edition of Faber's "Difficulties of Infidelity," which is said in the preface to have been "prepared with much care and research," but I have not been able to determine the accuracy or inaccuracy of the statement. It is immaterial, however.

Your allegations about Tacitus will come under consideration in the third thesis; they are as amusing as anything preserved in "Poggiana." Likewise your rather diffused theorizing on the antiquity of man, etc., would better suit the fourth thesis. Contenting myself with observing, as the Duke of Argyll says of a writer who promulgated similar theories, you seem "to adopt very rashly and very unnecessarily as conclusions of science—conclusions with regard to the origin and history of man—which I firmly believe will be found on further investigation to have no science whatever in support of them," I will also defer this until its proper place.

I need hardly say that the greater part of your letter is repetition upon repetition of what I have already answered. Still there are some new features about it. The foul slanders about the mother of Christ, filched originally from Celsus, are inexcusable because they have nothing but the ipse dixit of Celsus to support them. The cause of truth never calls slander to her defense. As to the Essenes, De Quincey is the only modern writer of any repute who identifies them with the Christians, your explanation of which is decidedly peculiar. I will overlook a great many errors for the sake of brevity, stopping, however, to examine your alleged quotations from the early Christian writers, which I really should not let pass unchallenged.

On reaching home the day I received your letter I took my Eusebius to test the quotations you allege from him. Judge of my surprise when I found in both cases a very material word or two either wrongly translated or misquoted, and the sense of both passages entirely misunderstood. I do not, however, suppose you are to blame; you probably copied some one else's quotation. Your quotation reads, "The philosophy which we profess truly flourished aforetime, but having blossomed again in the reign of Cæsar Augustus, thy ancestor, it proved to be above all things ominous of good for thy kingdom." It should be, "The philosophy which we profess first, indeed, flourished among the barbarians, but afterward, when it grew up, also among the nations under your government under the glorious reign of Augustus . . . that philosophy which commenced its existence with Augustus." You need not be informed that the Greeks and Romans called all other nations barbarians, and in saying that Christianity "first, indeed, flourished among the barbarians" Melito means that it first grew among the Jews, and he states a sentence or two further on that it was coeval with the time of Augustus. The second alleged quotation from Eusebius is equally incorrect. You give the title of chapter iv, book i, as, "The Religion Announced by Christ Nothing New or Strange," but the word is not "new" but "unexpected," and is so printed in my translation. You say he asserts that every pious person from Abraham to the first of the human race was a Christian, and hence says, "The religion delivered to us in the doctrines of Christ is not a new or strange doctrine." Your latter quotation is verbatim, although disjointed from its connection. What he says is this, "Should any one, beginning from Abraham and going back to the first man, pronounce those who have had the testimony of righteousness Christians in fact though not in name, he would not be far from the truth. They obviously knew the Christ of God, as he appeared to Abraham, communed with Isaac, spoke to Jacob," and the remainder of the derivation of Christianity is derived by him, not from the Gentile nations, but from the Jews alone.

The above mistakes prepared me to expect others in alleged quotations from other early Christians, and all I have examined have verified my suspicions. In fact you have been grossly misled; the early Christians never credited the heathen with being the origin of the doctrines of Christ; the most they said was that many of their philosophers held many correct views about the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and rewards and punishments in a future life. Permit me to say here for myself too, that I have no more reverence for the writing of the Fathers than I have for the sermons of modern divines. They must both be tested by the word of God. As they agree with it they are true; where they disagree they are false.

And now, my friend, as I leave this first thesis, may I commend to your careful attention the following remarks of the gifted Atheist, John Stuart Mill? "Whatever else may be taken away from us by rational criticism, Christ is still left, a unique figure, not more unlike all his precursors than all his followers, even those who had the direct benefit of his teachings. Who among his disciples, or among the proselytes, was capable of inventing the sayings ascribed to Jesus, or of imagining the life and character revealed in the gospel? Certainly not the fishermen of Galilee, as certainly not St. Paul, whose idiosyncrasies were of a totally different sort; still less the early Christian writers, in whom nothing is more evident than that the good which was in them was all derived, as they all profess that it was derived, from the higher source."

Can you hope to successfully overturn such testimony wrung from a heart that hated Christianity as ferociously as man ever could?

In a letter to the London Spectator of Feb. 10, 1866, Prof. Huxley writes, "It is and always has been a favorite tenet of mine, that Atheism is as absurd, logically speaking, as polytheism . . and denying the possibility of miracles seems to me quite as unjustifiable as speculative Atheism." To this admission of the high-priest of modern materialistic science the Duke of Argyll adds, "The question of miracles seems now to be admitted on all hands to be simply a question of evidence" (Reign of Law, p. 90).

There are really only two schools of objections to miracles, headed respectively by Hume and Strauss. You are a disciple of both. Both theories—one that miracles are incredible, the other that they are impossible—have been repeatedly overthrown. The theory of Strauss is still-born in his own land. The geological argument, as it is called, completely annihilates it. And certainly one would think that before the concession of Prof. Huxley you would withdraw your assertions.

You say: "When a tornado or cyclone sweeps over the face of portions of the earth at the rate of seventy-five miles an hour, prostrating trees, dwellings, and animals, and by whirlwinds lifting rocks weighing many hundreds of pounds and conveying them considerable distances, it is very easy for men and women to imagine that a supernatural power has caused it, and that a god was angry and showed his power. When a bolt of electricity leaves a black cloud surcharged with it, and rives a tall monarch of the forest, or demolishes some stately edifice in the lapse of a second of time, it is quite easy for superstitious people not informed of the powers of nature to imagine that a supernatural power has been employed, and that a god has again become angry; but when duly understood, the operation is found just as natural as the falling of an apple from a tree."

What is the application of the above to the matter under consideration? With which of Christ's miracles do you compare any of your instances?

Again, you say, "Many operations have become familiar to us now as natural occurrences that once would have been thought miraculous or supernatural results."

I ask, again, what is the application of this? Would any of Christ's miracles, if performed to-day, lose their miraculous character? Is not the raising of the dead miraculous? Is not restoring strength and flesh and bone instantly by a mere word miraculous? Is not giving sight to a man born blind miraculous? Does not the hushing of a storm by a word of command denote miraculous power? And so I might continue to show how futile your objection is.

I shall not examine the alleged miracles you have adduced in the conclusion of your letter. It would be merely wasting time and serve to prolong this thesis as unduly as the first. Instead, I challenge you, and I leave the reader to judge, whether you fairly meet my challenge to select any alleged miracle or series of miracles which you consider have as strong evidence to support them as Christ has to prove his. Detail them, name your authorities, chapter and paragraph, witnesses, place performed, purpose, etc., and I will adduce proof of the miracles of the New Testament incomparably stronger. In the hope that you will pointedly and briefly take up my challenge, I am,

Yours sincerely, G. M. MAIR.

Temperance from a Liberal Standpoint.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is now fifty-three years since I, then a boy in my teens, was induced to drink some rye whisky, under the influence of which I became partially intoxicated. About the same time, while in the company of some larger boys who were smoking cigars, I was prevailed upon to smoke with them. They told me it would make a man of me, and as that was the position I was anxious to attain to, I proceeded according to instructions. But I soon found I was getting sick and drunk, and down I fell. A more miserable boy it would be hard to find. When I recovered from this chastisment for the infraction of nature's laws, I made up my mind then and there that whisky and tobacco were two things I could get along without.

Some years after this a temperance society was organized in that neighborhood (Lancaster, Pa.), its members pledging themselvs to abstain from the "habitual use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage." This was about twelve years subsequent to the time I was made drunk on whisky, but I had not forgotten it, so of course I was ready to send in my name as a member with some forty others. Not long after this the Washingtonian Society was organized—I think it was in 1838—and we joined ourselvs to that.

At this stage of the temperance movement the Christian church, as a church, lent the cause no aid, though some of its lay members were true temperance workers. I still remember well the admonitions I received from the elders of that branch of the orthodox church of which I was then a member; they told me it had been gotten up in the wisdom of the creature, and would come to naught. But still the temperance cause moved forward, and intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, became less common.

In 1848 I came to this state, with my family. The church (orthodox Quakers) of which I was then a member sent their church letter after me, joining myself and family to the same sect here. As I became acquainted with its leaders, I found they were not in sympathy with the abolition movement nor the outside temperance movement. While my name stood in connection with both, of course my inspiration led me, in my public communication, to notice the importance of Friends bearing a faithful testimony against these two great and crying evils in our land; but the more I tried to reform the church by reason and common sense, the more the church tried to reform me by threats of expulsion, until finally, about the year 1852, it issued its bull of excommunication against me on the charge of being out of unity and running into wisdom; and according to their church disciplin they were now required to regard me as a heathen, and its leaders hav been true to its requirements in my case.

This intolerant course of the church I now look upon as the best thing that it could hav done for me, because, first, it exposed its own true character, and, secondly, it set me free from its bonds, so that I hav been able to become a Freethinker and Liberal reformer from a scientific basis; and upon that basis I can speak on the subject of temperance with the spirit of the understanding also.

Further along the Good Templar association was making quite a stir in the city where I then lived. I thought I would offer my name as a candidate for membership. My object in doing this was to see if they would accept me, for I had understood that an effort would be made to oppose my joining on account of my Liberal principles. Besides, I wanted to see and understand their position on the temperance question. After a vote in my favor I was accepted as a member. I soon found that this organization was based on the Bible, and, in fact, that it was a child of the church. Its temperance pledge was much stronger than the one I had first given my assent to. It included wine, beer, and cider, but said nothing about tobacco, which in my experience had proved more intoxicating than even whisky, brandy, or rum. Then, in my observation, I had noticed that as a rule all liquor drinkers were users of tobacco; and when I came to question them on this subject, I found they used tobacco first, and so it became, as it were, a leading-string to drinking habits. Pretty soon I brought this subject before the lodge. Our worthy chief, being himself an inveterate user of tobacco, called me to order, when I appealed to the audience. Their vote confirmed the judgment of the chair, that it was not in order to speak on the subject of tobacco in that lodge. This satisfied me with their Bible platform.

But here comes the red-ribbon movement, built on the favors of Almighty God and the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Being solicited to join them, I let them put their red ribbon on my vest. I was not long, however, in discovering that their foundation was faulty. In a neighboring city, through the influence of the red-ribbon movement, a citizen had been induced to sign the pledge. Not long afterward he met the president of his lodge in the street, when his unsteady gait betrayed his old weakness. The president accosted him thus: "How is this, that you hav violated your pledge so soon?" The citizen replied that it was not he that had broken the pledge, but God Almighty had failed to fulfil the contract on his part.

With the red ribbon came the crusade movement. This was a square church affair, carried on by the Christian clergy and old women, and was a fair test of the efficacy of prayer, as that was the instrumentality, they claimed, which would accomplish the work. And now what has been the result of all those years of Christian-morality labor? Why, taking their own statement, there is more liquor manufactured and drank to-day than forty years ago. So now, seeing that Almighty God is not able, or, being able, is unwilling to stop the evil, they say we must hav a prohibition law, and dry it up at the fountain-head. But let me tell you, kind friends, you cannot make this work any better than your prayers did, because while there is a demand there will be a supply. Liquor, like all other commodities, will be an article of traffic, and the demand will regulate the supply. See how it was with the African slave trade. This government, in its organization, made that a legal traffic for twenty years; then, after the year 1808, it was declared to be piracy; yet the southern part of the nation demanded more slaves, and the trade went on just the same, only in a more clandestin manner. It was proved in the British Parliament that more slaves were stolen from Africa after 1808 than before. So it can be seen that while the demand lasted, the supply was forthcoming.

It has been said that the abolition of slavery was brought about by political action. This is a mistake. It was brought about directly as a military measure, remotely by true moral agitation. For many long years the Christian church opposed this agitation in the North, and in the South it was defended as in accordance with Christian morality; and even in the North I hav heard pious Christian ministers quote text after text from their Bible to prove slavery to be in accordance with the will of Almighty God, or he would not permit it to exist in the land, as he had all power both in heaven.

Now I would say, instead of looking toward the manufacturer and vender as the source of the evil, let us turn our attention the other way, toward the consumer, and see if it is not for the want of a correct sense of a higher manhood, one based on intelligence, common sense, and natural morality, that the cause of temperance languishes. When all the true and earnest temperance laborers are able to see this in its correctness, then they will come together as a band of intelligent, moral thinkers, and demand that Christians giv us a higher and truer toned morality. In a word, they will demand a religion based on manhood and common sense, instead of one based, as at present, on holy bibles, holy ghosts, holy angels, and dreams. When this good time comes round, as come round it will, then the work of a higher life will hav been begun. Then, instead of superstition, as at present, discourses to the people will be based on science, and instead of having but one text-book, and that got up by nobody knows who nor where nor when, nature's great volume shall be opened, and texts taken from it; and one of the grandest of those texts, one that is most nearly related to the subject of this essay, might be, "Man, know thyself!" This would lead to the science of parentage; and a speaker posted on this subject would be able to show his hearers that this question lies at the foundation of true temperance, because it is not in accordance with nature's law for perfection to come from imperfection; that if the parent is the victim of wicked or vicious habit that has brought about a morbid condition of body or brain, whether he is conscious of it or not, his offspring is likely to become also a victim of the same constitutional taint, and thus thousands and tens of thousands are born every year with an inherited appetite for both tobacco and liquor, for these two evils must be classed together as twin brothers, or rather demons. That man with a cigar between his lips, or with his mouth full of tobaccco juice, is a bad missionary to talk to his brother on the evils of liquor drinking. Indeed it would be better for the temperance cause were he to stand off from it, for he only becomes a stumbling-block and his name a by-word to the intelligent thinker who may moderately indulge in the habit of drinking.

I will giv one case that came to my knowledge to illustrate. It was when I lived in the city, and was a member of the Good Templars. Our worthy chief was a victim of tobacco, as has been noticed. One of our aged citizens, a man that did not use tobacco, but took a little more strong drink than was best for him at times, one day accosted me thus, "Mr. Moore, I must tell you a little anecdote. I was talking to one of your Good Templars who had a great deal to say about the evils of intemperance, and his breath smelled so strong of tobacco that I had to request him to turn his face the other way while he talked to me."

Now when the parentage of the child is all right, its early training will be all-important in order to instill into its mind the necessity of correct habits, and so we shall learn that here is the place where, as true natural-morality laborers, we hav to work, rather than in the Christian-morality vinyard, with a ghost-begotten child for our leader, a young man that was able to, and did, according to the story, turn water into liquor for people to drink, even after they were already drunk, and one of whose chief apostles recommended his son to drink wine for his stomach's sake. This is an excuse for the liquor drinker to-day, and also for the tobacco user. Then the holy Bible, as it is called, on which the Christian religion is built, abounds in passages that the rum drinker can use as a license to the indulgence of his morbid taste. Let us read one or two paragraphs, and many more might be read:

"And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen or for sheep or for wine, or for strong drink."

Again:

"Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more."

This is a license to drink until one becomes what is called dead drunk. But this is sufficient. We do not want to build our temperance principles on any such a book as that, though there may be some passages of an opposit character. As we can find passages in it that read both ways on any subject we may choose, it therefore settles nothing. There is no use in our bothering our brains over it in discussing any question, but we may turn our thoughts toward a higher manhood, one based on intelligence, common sense, and natural morality. Of course we take all in as parties to this great and crying evil, from the farmer that raises grain and sells it to the distiller, and the one that grows the tobacco, to the inebriate that dies with the delirium tremens.

S. D. Moore.

A Positivist Funeral and Its Lesson.

Coming events cast their shadows before.

The doom of Christian doctrin, Christian dogma, Christian philosophy is no longer doubtful. Even the orthodox—I mean the orthodox who think, and they are myriads now—know and feel beyond all peradventure that their creed as creed is dead. The lessening congregations throughout every sect confirm this fact beyond all contradiction. When many Christian ministers renounce the Christian hell they break a link that parts their chain of faith in sunder, for hell once banished to the limbo of the past, the doctrins of the soul and heaven, of the God and immortality they preach, must likewise tread the path of quick decay. Their tenets sink or swim together. The laity perceive this if the priests do not.

But still, in spite of all the doubts that underlie its creed, the church wields mighty power. Why is this so? The answer is, it still holds sway within the hearts of men. It ministers to their affections, speeds them to a better life; it seeks to guard and regulate morality; it feeds the poor and heals the broken-hearted; its arched and oriel windows, with their dim and holy light, evoke a calm repose; its choirs impel the worshipers through song and praise to nobler emulations; it takes the babe within its outstretched arms, admitting it to fellowship through baptism; it weds the blushing maiden to the manly youth; and when the last sad tragedy of death comes nigh it holds the cup of sacrament to dying lips and chants its solemn requiem o'er the grave. An institution mingling thus with all the sweeter, more religious sides of man, dies very, very hard, and well it is that this is so.

And if I thought that Liberalism was impotent to yield such consolations or other equal ones, I am free to say, with all my detestation of the errors of theology, I believe my heart would keep me in the church.

But we constructiv Liberals, believers in the new faith of Humanity, are resolute to claim at least equality on this as well as other grounds. We know we satisfy the heart as well as head. This nowhere can be better shown than in the new religion's fitness to giv the dead a solemn burial and bear its messages of peace and resignation to stricken relativs and friends.

From out the little band that forms the Society of Humanity a sweet life passed away. Its secretary, Mrs. Erving, after protracted illness, died. The funeral services were held on March 16th in the parlor of her quiet residence. Mr. Brown, the president of the society, began the rite by appropriate quotations from various books, both sacred and profane, so called. I giv you one or two. This is from Victor Hugo's eulogy at George Sands' funeral: "We weep for the dead and salute the immortal. We hav loved her, we hav admired her; to-day in the presence of the august serenity of death we contemplate her. We felicitate her because what she has done is great, and we thank her because what she has done is good. Hav we lost her? No; these beings disappear but do not vanish. Far from it; one can almost say that they are realized. By becoming invisible under one form they become visible under another. A sublime transfiguration. The human form is an occultation. It masks the real and divine usage which is the idea. Our departed sister was an idea; she escaped from the flesh, and behold she is free. She is dead, and behold she is living."

Here is another: "The kingdom of heaven is within us, and in that realm our dead abide immortal." And another from the Psalms: "So let us number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

The reading of such texts over, which probably consumed some five or eight minutes, Mr. Wakeman—in intellect a sage, in heart a woman, and in soul a poet—delivered the most touching funeral address I ever heard. In a voice broken by emotion he spoke of the deceased as if he saw three visions of her life.

In vision one, her youth with all its grace and joyousness was told, but underneath which ever ran devotion to her duties, as shown in close attention to the noble sphere, which at an early age she choose, of instructress to the young.

In vision two her growth to womanhood and saint-hood was depicted. Her life had brought to her the hard career of blighted hopes so common to us all.

He painted tenderly her deep distress when, alienated from the ancient faith, she seemed to know not where to turn for light. Then came her inspiration to the newer life and higher sense of human obligation, by which the olden brotherhood in Christ becomes the brotherhood in man, and duty blossoms in enthusiasm. And thus inspired she grew in holiness (whole-iness), resigned to the inevitable, more patient in her work, more hopeful in her life, more gentle in her manners, dispensing kindly influence on all she came in contact with, especially within her school, her home, and her society. In vision three, the speaker said, the angel one whom death had freed appeared. Her body to the ground might be consigned and there return into its elements, but her soul was only buried, like the seeds of flowers, in the hearts of loved ones she had left, there to sprout and blossom in the everlasting impress of her character. The soul of a saint like her could never die. It lived again in thousands of the children she had taught and led to usefulness and good; it lived transfigured in the memory of friends, as part and parcel of their very life, to be by them passed on to countless generations through the tide of human influence.

She had gone "to join the choir invisible of those immortal dead who lived again in minds made better by their presence." And thus, her mere material existence being done, her realest life, her angel life, came out distinct and clear, transfigured in the sovereignty of the good.

Mr. Wakeman's invocation being thus concluded, I followed by request with the reading of a favorit poem of the deceased, "The Dying Flower;" and then came touching testimonials to their departed sister form her fellow-members, Mrs. Bristol and Mrs. Neymann.

Although no surpliced priest was there, and though the whole observance was without pretense, it yet was solemn, tender, sympathetic. There scarcely was a dry eye in the room.

But interesting as the occasion was to relativs and friends, it seems to me in view of all its bearings and its consequences, that it displays itself as big with promis and with possibilities. If consolation can be found through purely human means in the midst of this the worst of all afflictions, it follows that the Religion of Humanity is equal now to every call that may be made upon it. In each event of life, in birth, in marriage, or in death, in sickness or in health, in sorrow or in joy, this last of all the faiths, the faith which is the outgrowth of them all, the faith of Science and Humanity, now stands prepared to giv its benedictions and to meet the deepest needs of all religious men.

Like all new cults the new religion contends with poverty. It boasts no temples yet, but these will rear themselvs as time runs on, and men and women, in a new and grand enthusiasm, will make the earth itself the universal church as they unite themselvs in loving aims, to here make realizable the falsely-fancied heaven existent in the skies.

Several books hav been written by men who hav been consigned to prison for opinion's sake, but none, I venture to say, are so voluminous or evince more research into the subjects considered than "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." I know of no work that givs so much information upon a subject, correct data for which is generally inaccesible. A whole library is epitomized in its pages.

Reply to Mr. Mair's Sixth Letter.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I am not surprised that you still wish to decry and denounce my authorities, and thus break the force of their damaging proofs. This has been the persistent course of Christianity for many hundreds of years. Origen and his Christian associates in the third century carefully destroyed all writings and books that militated against the Christian story and creed. The writings of the extensive Christian sect, the Gnostics, who flourished in the first and second centuries, and who stoutly maintained that Christ had no corporeal existence, but was simply a spiritual personage, were destroyed. The elaborate and damaging arguments and statements of Celsus showing up the false claims of Christianity were purposely extirpated. All that is now known of what Celsus wrote is from what Origen quoted from him in his attempted refutation. All the original writings of Celsus were destroyed by Christians. And the warfare on unbelievers and their writings has continued down to the present time. Both heretics and their writings were publicly burnt for hundreds of years. Bruno was burnt at the stake because he taught scientific truths in opposition to Christian dogmas. Servetus was roasted to death by a slow fire of green wood by your patron saint and reformer, John Calvin, because he had dared to write a book in which he denied that Jesus was his own father and the creator of heaven and earth. Thousands upon thousands have been put to death in a similar manner and for similar reasons.

How have unbelieving writers been denounced and their productions tabooed! How has Voltaire been abused by the church! How has Paine been belied and his books destroyed! Thousands of copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" and others of his works have been publicly and privately burnt, both in England and in this country. This was the only way in which they were able to answer his arguments. Many instances where the "Age of Reason" has been burnt have been brought to my knowledge. Gladly would they also have burned the author. In the same spirit have thousands of copies of my paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, been burnt. Often do I get letters informing me how some pious Christian has burnt copies of my paper. A few days ago a clergyman in one of the Western states snatched two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the hands of the person who obtained them from me, and threw them into the fire. It has been said many times that I ought to be burnt at the stake, and there are many who would gladly assist in that Christian occupation. I have myself served out a sentence of thirteen months' imprisonment, imposed upon me by Christian hate and persecution because I presumed to speak and publish against its creed.

What if the cyclopedias do not recognize Higgins, Taylor, and Inman? It is not to be expected and makes them none the less true and trustworthy. The cyclopedias are gotten up by Christians and to please the Christian class. We, as unbelievers, cannot expect, either in England or in this country, that Christian writers will do us justice or give us an equal show. But few abler or more honest men have arisen than Higgins, Taylor, and Inman. It is quite possible they may have been led into a slight error here and there, but such instances are few and insignificant. Their arguments and facts have not been and cannot be disproved. Inman's most effective arguments against Christian claims are based upon statues, inscriptions, coins, and other works of antiquity found in the ruins of ancient cities and now in the British Museum. He requires the indorsement of no cyclopedia or other Christian publication to sustain him. The facts he gives are accessible to all, and cannot be overthrown. I have said but little about Jacolliot. He has been much objected to because he applied the name Jezeus Christna to the Hindoo savior; and he has been accused of falsifying because the name Jesus Christ is so nearly like it. Madam Blavatsky, however, in "Isis Unveiled," corroborates Jacolliot, and says she has heard in India, among the worshipers of Christna, the identical name Jezeus Christna used over and over again. If you can only succeed in denouncing and casting aside all antichristian authorities, and in having all pro-Christian writers fully accepted, you will doubtless be able to maintain your positions; but this you will hardly be able to accomplish.

Your sneer at my arguments relative to Tacitus and Poggio Bracciolini may be well enough, but if you have any proofs that Tacitus's Annals were known by any of the Christian Fathers or before the fifteenth century, I again ask you to bring them forward.

I notice you again make use of your favorite word "filched," charging Talleyrand with having "filched" from Celsus. Filching is another term for stealing, and is objectionable. If you see fit to use the statements or sentiments of another, or to use passages from John Calvin, John Knox, or the Bible, I will not accuse you of "filching." I will try to be more courteous.

I do not see that you make much by the discovery of a few words variation in the different translations of Eusebius. The disagreement is no greater than is often between two translations. Your quotation by no means changes the nature of the confession Eusebius made. Even if what you say about the Romans is true, I have only to remark that Eusebius was neither a Greek nor Roman, and did not write from a Roman standpoint. I notice you do not attempt to evade the force of the confession of Justin Martyr that the idea of a begotten son of God born of a virgin, and of a crucified son of God, had earlier existed in pagan religions.

It matters little to me, perhaps, what John Stuart Mill's opinion of Jesus might have been, and I ask you to allow me to be as indifferent to them as you are to those of the early Christian Fathers as to the antiquity of theological myths. I do not object to Mill, Theodore Parker, yourself, or any other person entertaining a favorable opinion of the character of an ideal Jesus any more than for a high regard for Kris-Kringle, Robinson Crusoe, John Bull, Brother Jonathan, or Miss Columbia. There is something admirable in the character ascribed to each, but the reality of all is equally mythical.

I hardly expected you would like my views on miracles, but I cannot see why you should be at a loss to understand why I referred to the occurrence of tornadoes, cyclones, and strokes of lightning, when by the ignorant and unthinking those phenomena are so often regarded as miracles. In treating the subject of miracles it seems to me very proper to consider natural phenomena that are often mistaken for miracles. You ask what all this has to do with the miracles of Christ? It has to do with the subject of miracles generally.

As a kind of "knock-down argument" you ask if raising persons from the dead, imparting sight to those born blind, etc., are not miracles. I readily answer, Yes; but I will have to wait till I have much better evidence than I have yet met with before I can believe that any such events have ever taken place. Such feats have been ascribed to several different personages, but, unfortunately, the bare assertions is all we have to depend upon, and it is insufficient to convince one of an incredulous cast of mind. A person who can readily accept as fact the wildest unsupported assertions of unknown parties is a very unsafe guide to depend upon. His opinions are not entitled to much consideration.

You close your letter by a challenge to select any miracle or series of miracles having as strong evidence to suppert them as Christ has to prove his. You could hardly have asked for anything easier performed. I explicitly said I did not believe a miracle had ever been performed or taken place. I look upon all pretended miracles as of the same class and all alike unworthy of belief. So I will turn over for your comparison any of the pretended miracles of Moses, the magicians of Egypt, Joshua, Samson, David, Elijah, Elisha, Zoroaster, Christna, Buddha, the Egyptian, Grecian, and Roman deities, demigods and heroes, Apollonius, Simon Magus, Mohammed, St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Januarius, St. Jerome, St. Patrick, and any others of the thousand and one saints who are said to have performed miracles, and let you compare them with those ascribed to Jesus, and allow you to discover, if possible, any particular difference in them. They are all unnatural, impossible circumstances, and all depend wholly upon somebody's say so, all equally unproved, and all equally unworthy of belief.

Not to be any less enterprising than yourself, I challenge you to produce the proofs that any one of the miracles ascribed to Jesus ever took place; and I hereby give you notice that I shall require better proofs than are found in what are called the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Andrew, Nicodemus, Philip, Bartholomew, Judas, Pilate, or any others of the hundreds of the so-called gospels which the second and third centuries were so prolific in producing. I regard them all as falsehoods and the repetitions of falsehoods. The authors of them are wholly unknown, but it is almost a positive fact that not one of them was written by the persons to whom they are ascribed; and so starting out with a falsehood as to the writers, no confidence can be placed in anything that is said by them. They are undoubtedly compilations of legends and traditions that had passed from mouth to mouth for three or four generations (much like the folk-lore, ghost and witch stories of Germany, Scandinavia, and other countries), and changed, enlarged, and exaggerated as ignorant and credulous people invariably change and exaggerate their extravagant myths and legends, and when committed to writing they were claimed to have been written by some popular person to give them weight and consideration.

I repeat that neither of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John was written by the persons whose names they bear, nor were they written in the time when those persons lived. There is not the slightest proof that either of these gospels had an existence until after those persons had been in their graves a hundred years. If you can show to the contrary I ask you to show it.

If I am correct, what kind of proof do these so-called gospels afford that such events as raising the dead to life, causing those to see who had no eyes, finding a mountain so high that from the top of it all the countries on the opposite side of the globe could be seen, etc? None at all. That I am correct I think I will be able to show you and our readers, when we have reached the proper thesis.

I am fully convinced that the entire Christian religion is based upon a system of falsehood and ignorance.

1. The claim that the earth and the other orbs and worlds were first brought into existence less than six thousand years ago is false. Science demonstrates this clearly.

2. The claim that the earth was created, and brought forth vegetation of all kinds, including flowers, seeds, and fruits, before the existence of the sun, is false.

3. The claim that a firmament was made to divide the waters above it from those below, and that rain was produced by the windows in this firmament being opened, is false.

4. The claim that this firmament was capable of sustaining water enough to cover, when the windows were opened, the whole surface of the earth, is false.

5. The claim that God endowed a snake with the intelligence and power to circumvent and defeat the plans and undertakings of deity is false.

6. The claim that four large rivers had their source in one little garden spot, and from it flowed in different directions, is false.

7. The claim that man has existed less than six thousand years, and that at that time he was morally and intellectually high and then fell, is false.

8. The claim that previous to the windows of heaven being opened all the species and varieties of animals, reptiles, birds, and insects came from all the zones and quarters of the earth and gathered themselves into a large box, pitched without and within, which Noah constructed, and lived there together without food, light, or air for thirteen months, is false.

9. The stories about Moses producing what are called the plagues of Egypt, changing all the water into blood, putting out the light of the sun, killing all the cattle and live stock, and all the first-born among the people, opening the Red Sea, bringing forth water from rocks, etc., I believe to be false.

10. The claim that Joshua stopped and parted a rapid river; that by a word he stopped the sun and moon, is false.

11. The claim that 1881 years ago a person was begotten and born without a natural father, and that he was God, is false.

12. The claim that there is any proof, worthy of the name, that any of these things are so is false.

I could easily enlarge upon these false claims to the number of twenty dozen or more, but a single dozen of the falsehoods upon which Christianity is based is enough for our present purpose. And in this connection let me impress upon your mind that the apostolic Fathers make no mention of the miracles of Jesus, nor of his miraculous conception, nor of his material resurrection. Ignatius, in the second century, was the first one to refer to the immaculate conception. The four canonical gospels and the book of Acts, which contain the account of the miracles of Jesus and his apostles, were not spoken of, quoted from, nor hinted at till the latter part of the second century. Thus we learn that the gospels had no existence until then, and that the doctrine of miracles was to a great extent an after-thought, gotten up more than a hundred years after the time Jesus is said to have given up the ghost. Let me ask you, is it not really a most singular fact if Jesus was begotten without a father; if when he grew up to manhood he performed such miracles as raising people from the dead, and causing those to see who had no eyes, or who could not see with them if they had eyes, that these affairs were not mentioned or quoted till a century after his death? Is it not indeed more than probable if those marvelous stories had been true they would frequently have been in the mouths of the apostolic Fathers?

Truly has it been said by Judge Waite: "A hundred years of silence, by Christian writers, is at least wonderful, if such miracles were then believed. And equally wonderful is the fact that no Jewish or heathen historian, during that period, has recorded that such events were reported of Jesus, and believed by his followers. It is not probable that Christ ever claimed or pretended to work miracles. Such pretensions would hav detracted from his exalted character, and would have placed him upon a level with Simon Magus, Apollonius, and other miracle-workers of that age. Beyond what is contained in the epistles of Paul, it does not appear that any claim was made to the power of working miracles in the church until about the middle of the second century" (History of the Christian Religion to A. D. 200, p. 374).

It must be admitted that documentary evidence is a very poor kind of proof to sustain a miracle. It is much more so when the documents are written by persons who did not themselves witness the performance of the miracles, as was the case with Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and still more so when the documents are pretended to have been written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, but were not, in fact, in existence till after they had been in their graves a hundred years. If there is a falsehood in the authorship of these documents, what reasonable reliance can be placed on the supernatural and impossible events said to have been performed?

In leaving the subject of miracles, let me suggest that if miracles were necessary to establish the truth of the mission of Christ, and he possessed the power to perform any act he pleased, he did not take the best possible way to convince the world and to hand down to unborn millions the great proofs of his divinity. If it is necessary to the salvation of the world that it should believe in his divine parentage and in his power to perform miracles, he was certainly derelict in his duty not to have given the most convincing proofs and to have placed the same before every human being. How much more convincing it would have been, instead of his being begotten in secret and darkness, without a single witness, to have come openly, in the light of day, direct from the Father's throne, through the vault of heaven, showing himself visibly and unmistakably to the whole world! How striking it would have been had the Father and Son, in celestial glory, approached the earth, and still, while far above it have halted and remained in one position for twenty-four hours, while the globe made a revolution on its axis, and thus have given a chance for all the inhabitants of the earth to see them! This would have been far more open and convincing than for God to seek a young maiden's sleeping apartment and do a secret act, when no one knew aught of it, and the cuckold husband be left to dream it out for his own satisfaction and for the information of the whole world.

How easy it would be for all mankind to believe in Jesus Christ being the son of God if every year he would show himself to the world in the space above the earth so that all could see him! It would not require a very great effort on his part to do this; and if he helped mortals to believe, and thus be saved from an endless hell, he could well afford to put himself to that much trouble. It would be so much more convincing to see him every year than to be compelled to take somebody's unreliable statement, whom we do not know to be truthful or worthy of confidence, and who know no more about it than ourselves.

Yes, if a belief in miracles is of such immense consequence as the early advocates of the Christian religion and the founders of other religions supposed, and the eternal happiness of mankind hinges on this belief, what a sad and mournful thing it is that some plan could not by the wisdom of heaven hav been devised so that a belief in the miracles and power of Jesus should hav been brought home to every individual, and so that his miracles should not hav been of the same suspicious character, and related in the same imperfect, slovenly, unreliable manner resorted to by the founders of all the false religions, false redeemers, and false saviors of which the world has had so many, long before the Christian demi-god was thought of! This must ever be the great regret of the world.

THIRD THESIS.

Our next thesis reads thus: "The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history." This thesis you sub-divided into, Firstly: "It was not written by Jesus himself nor by his apostles;" Secondly: "What are called the four gospels are unauthentic or spurious productions. Not one was written by the person whose name it bears, and not one was known to be in existence until one hundred and fifty years after the reported death of Jesus;" Thirdly: "There were large numbers of what were called gospels and epistles in the first few Christian centuries, which were not admitted into the Christian canon, but vied with the canonical gospels in correctness, and were as well entitled to be admitted as a large majority of the books that were called inspired and were accepted as such;" Fourthly: "The early Christian Fathers were designing, hypocritical, and dishonest. Their contentions and quarrels about matters of faith and the authenticity of certain gospels and epistles continued for centuries."

This thesis, with its sub-divisions, is pretty extensive, but has been already alluded to, and asserted in substance several times. This reply has already reached too great length to admit of entering thoroughly into the subject now. You will hardly dispute that Jesus himself wrote no part of the four gospels, or that there is any account that he left a word of anything in writing. That hundreds of gospels and epistles were produced within the first four centuries you will also hardly deny. Many of these have been lost in the lapse of centuries, while many still remain. The four canonical gospels of the New Testament, after many years spent over them in quarreling, contentions, and fighting, have been accepted as the veritable word of God, while all the others were discarded as bogus, spurious, and false gospels. In the contention that took place on this exciting question the bishops and leaders of the church often denounced the canonical gospels as spurious, and proclaimed some of the apocryphal gospels as genuine, and their disputations, contentions, criminations, and recriminations were kept up for more than a hundred years.

Some of these gospels related partly the same incidents and miracles contained in the canonical gospels, while others contained quite a new set of wonderful events; and it is not strange that the early Fathers and bishops were sorely troubled to decide which among all these conflicting claims were true. In some of the gospels which we have several astounding miracles related, which even you, with all your faith, will hardly insist that I must accept as truth or merit eternal hell by not doing so.

One of these gospels, the Protevangelion, gives the account of the Virgin Mary's being begotten, of the ministration of angels to her mother, of miraculous events which took place in her infancy and childhood, of the annunciation of the angel to Mary about the visit from the Holy Ghost, and the overshadowing business; of the the trouble of Joseph and the whole thing being explained to him in a dream; of Mary's bringing forth Jesus in a cave; of the farmers, the shepherds, the sheep, and the fowls of the air standing still while birth took place; of a bright cloud which stood over the cave; of the cave being filled with light; of a mountain dividing and taking in Elizabeth and her young son John to enable them to escape from Herod, etc.

In another gospel—Infancy—some very astounding miracles are narrated; how Jesus, when an infant in the cradle, spoke and informed his mother that he was the son of God, of cures performed by the very little Jesus, of devils being cast out by the virtue in the swaddling-clothes, of idols falling down before him, of a leprous girl being cured by the water in which Jesus had been washed; of other lepers cured and devils cast out; of a young man turned into a mule, and being changed into a young man again by the baby Jesus being placed upon his back; of Jesus causing a well to spring forth from a sycamore tree; sick children cured by the wash-water of Jesus; of the child Caleb being thrown into a hot oven and into a well without injury; of a princess and more lepers cured by Jesus' wash-water; of a girl whose blood Satan had sucked, and who was placed in a very bad condition being cured by Jesus' swaddling-clothes; about Jesus making Satan take the form of a dog; about Jesus making animals and birds of clay and infusing them with life; about Jesus widening and contracting gates, milk pails, sieves, and boxes not properly made by Joseph; about Jesus stretching the lumber on which Joseph had been working two years making a throne, but had made it two cubits too short; how Jesus changes boys into kids and then changes them into boys again; Jesus brings a dead boy to life and kills two other boys; Jesus is sent to school to Zaccheus us to learn his letters, but he teaches the old man, and upon being sent to another schoolmaster who attempts to whip the child, the master's hand withers and he dies; Jesus at four years of age makes muddy water clear, makes sparrows of mud, withers a boy who offended him; kills another boy, smites another with blindness, astonishes his teacher by his learning, etc.

The gospel of Nicodemus, after giving an account of Jesus' arrest, trial, condemnation, and execution, details how men were raised from the dead, startling adventures in hell, quarrels about the expected arrival of Christ, Christ's descent into hell; death and the devils in great horror thereat, he tramples on death, seizes the prince of hell, and takes Adam off to heaven. Christ gives Beelzebub power over Satan; with astonishing accounts about persons from hell visiting earth and vanishing suddenly and returning to hell, with investigations on the part of Pilate, etc.

I will not detain you with further mention of the other gospels, but will remark that they stood on an equality in point of authenticity and reliability. In the several councils held by the church to decide which should be regarded as the word of God and which not, differences of opinion prevailed. Some of the clamorous contestants thought certain gospels that were discarded should have been accepted and that some that were accepted should have been discarded. It has been stated by some authorities that the gospel of Luke was admitted to the canon by a single vote. In the manner of statement, in the uncertainty of authorship, in the improbability and impossibility of the narratives, there seems very little difference between the canonical and the apocryphal gospels. The one class presents as much proof of being written or dictated by Eternal Wisdom as the other, and that is just none at all.

I have not room here to enter into a historic examination of the four canonical gospels, but for the present will repeat what I have said before, that among the gospels used in the early Christian churches, and which were alluded to and quoted by the Fathers and Christian writers up to the year 170, the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were not among them. There is no proof that can be adduced that those gospels were known or had ever been heard of up to that time. This I claim is the next thing to proof positive that they were not in existence till then. Had they been known, had they been in existence, they surely would have been quoted and referred to over and over again by the Fathers, bishops, and teachers of that time. There is no escape from this conclusion. Had they existed from the days of the apostles, as is pretended, they would have been referred to thousands of times before the year 170.

You cannot deny that in neither of the canonical gospels is it claimed that they were written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John; nor is it once claimed that they were written by inspiration, or that the smallest amount of divine aid was required to get them up. They are incongruous, irregular, diverse, contradictory, and quite too imperfect to ascribe to a being of infinite power and wisdom. I will not now take the time to point out the numerous discrepancies and contradictions, or the wide difference between the first three canonical gospels and the fourth. I may dwell upon their incongruity in my next. I will, however, call your attention to the fact that in the copying process through which they have passed an unlimited number of errors have taken place, every copyist having the option to make changes whenever he pleased. It is stated that thirty-two thousand different versions of the New Testament are in existence. That fearful errors in translation were made is fully proved by the important changes made by the revising committee, which for the past ten years has been working over what passes for the word of God. It is said they have expurgated hell and made a great number of changes. It would seem that God must be very indifferent about the errors in his book if he will let eighteen hundred years pass by with thousands of errors uncorrected. It is not at all improbable that the tinkering and revising may be kept up until people lose about all the respect and reverence they ever entertained for the incongruous medley by unknown authors.

It will of course be incumbent upon you to show that the four canonical gospels were written by the persons whose names they bear. If you can show that they were quoted or mentioned by the early Fathers and writers previous to the year I have named you will certainly point it out. Failing to do this you will be compelled to yield that those gospels were not in existence till the year 170, and that it is an arrant falsehood to assert that they were written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. Mosheim, in his "Ecclesiastical History," informs us that it was a habit of the early Christians to attach great names to their writings in order to cover their want of merit or truth. In speaking of the pretended histories of those early times he says: "Several histories of his life [Jesus's] and doctrines, full of pious frauds and fabulous wonders, were composed by persons whose intentions perhaps were not bad, but whose writings discovered the greatest superstition and ignorance. Nor was this all. Productions appeared which were imposed upon the world by fraudulent men as the writings of the holy apostles" (Eccl. Hist., London ed., 1847, p. 31). The four canonical gospels undoubtedly belong to this class.

It does not appear that St. Barnabas, bishop of Milan, knew anything of the four canonical gospels; neither did St. Clement, bishop of Rome; neither did St. Hermas, bishop of Philippolis; neither did St. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna; neither did St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch; neither did Papias, bishop of Hierapolis; neither did Quadratus, bishop of Athens; neither did Aristides of Athens; neither did Hegeseppus; neither did Justin Martyr; neither did Melito, bishop of Sardis.

The first man to mention the four gospels was Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, who flourished in the latter part of the second century. He was the first to insist upon four gospels, and the reasons which he assigned why there should be no more and no less than four seem weak and frivolous—because there are four universal winds and four quarters to the globe. He said the Word or Architect of all things gave the gospel in a fourfold shape. He evinced a special fondness for establishing a belief in the four gospels, and it is not improbable that he had something to do with devising them or modifying them from other gospels. Dr. Davidson was doubtless quite correct in denouncing Irenæus as blundering and unreliable. This is the first man known to have made allusion to either of our four canonical gospels. But more of this hereafter. I am, sincerely yours,

THE "Besant-Hatchard Debate" (price 25 cents) is a good book to read and loan to Christian friends, who will be astonished to see how easily Mrs. Besant overthrows the champion which the English church put forward.

Ways and Means.—Concluded.

AN APPEAL FOR THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PRACTICAL ESTIMATES.

But let us return to the financial basis upon which the League must now be placed for effectiv work. Men are liberal enough with money for philanthropic enterprise if they hav confidence in the cause to which they are asked to contribute and approve of its objects—and the Liberals are as liberal as anybody. In this republic of 50,000,000 inhabitants, with not over 10,000,000 of them members or attendants upon any church, it would not seem extravagant to make the following estimate:

First. That there are 5,000 Liberals perfectly able and entirely willing to take an annual membership in the National Liberal League and pay one dollar for it. That would make an annual revenue of $5,000.

Second. There is no doubt either that there are 500 Liberals able to take a life membership and pay $25 for it. That would make a fund of $12,500.

Third. Also there are 1,000 Liberals in the United States able to contribute annually as a free gift directly to the treasury of the League $10 each. That would make a fund of $10,000.

Fourth. There are also 100 staunch, strong, philanthropic Liberals in the United States perfectly able to giv $100 each, who could giv that sum and never feel the loss of it, $10,000.

These sums make a grand total of $37,500.

$37,500! That seems an enormous sum to come out of the pockets of skeptics, Atheists, Deists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Infidels, and Freethinkers. It certainly is larger than has ever yet been contributed by them for any common purpose. And yet $37,500 would be a mere bagatel in the treasuries of the 10,000,000 benighted rank and file who attend and support the churches. Suppose only one dollar per annum contributed by each Christian. That would be $10,000,000 for them to begin with. But nobody who is anybody in the churches gets off with only a dollar. In most churches the plate goes round regularly at every service on every Sunday. There isn't a Bridget servant girl in any city, working for eight dollars a month, who does not pay at the least five dollars a year, and many of them twice as much, into the coffers of the church. This sum is lured from her pockets by her love of ostentation, ceremony, and scenic display, but is mainly extorted from her fears. Will not Liberals give from their intelligence to spread the light that shines in their own souls, a small per cent of the sums that these deluded creatures giv to please their vanity and relieve their fright?

But let us go above Bridget and just look, item by item, at what it costs an average church man to save his soul. First, the pastor's salary, which sometimes takes the shape of pew rent, amounts

Per annum to	$10
Foreign missions	2
Bible Society	2
Tract Society	1
Sunday-school—two children, one penny each per week	1
Hymn-book, prayer-book, Bible, etc. (wear and tear)	1
Church journals	3
Church fairs	1
Church repairs	1
Fire, light, salary of sexton, etc	1
Total	$23

There are as many as 1,000,000 heads of families in the United States whose church connection costs as much as $23 per annum, making an aggregate sum of $23,000,000. Further than that there are as many as 10,000 Infidel, Freethinking heads of families, who do not believe one word of the doctrins of the church; and yet, for the sake of patronage and popularity, they are paying an average of $23 per annum into the church treasury, aggregatiug $230,000 of Infidel money doing Christian duty in the churches. Is it so preposterous, then, that I call for the enlistment of less than 10,000 Freethinking Liberals, who will contribute an aggregate of $37,500 to support the divine ordinances of a Freethought National Liberal League? I know it can be done. If not immediately, it can be grown up to in no very great length of time.

But lest I be deemed as looking at Liberal resources with too big eyes, I will cut down the estimate one half, and then we hav $18,750. That is a modest and moderate little sum to ask of the Liberals of this republic per annum.

Now let us see what can be done with	$18,750
First. A business office large enough to accommodate sessions of committees, rent per annum	$ 500
Second. Outfit of desks, chairs, copying press, type writer, blank books, postage, stationery, fire, gas, etc	500
Third. Two clerks, women, one short-hand corresponding clerk, one bookkeeper and copyist, $500 each	1,000
Fourth. Office boy, acting also as messenger and semi clerk	250
Fifth. Secretary of the National League, giving his whole time	1,500
Sixth. Chairman of the National Executiv Committee giving full time	1,500
Seventh. Chairman of the National Financial Committee, giving full time lecturing, soliciting, and collecting	1,500
Eighth. Twenty chairmen of state committees in twenty of the principal states at $500 each. (These chairmen can increase their pay by lecturing, selling books, etc.)	10,000
Ninth. Advertising	1,000
Tenth Expenses of Annual Congress	300
	$18,050

This shows that $18,750 would put the National League on its feet, set all its departments in motion, enlarge its field of enterprise, and giv it a good working force of laborers who can be increased as the demand for them increases and as the revenue to pay them is contributed. The sum of $18,750 would do this and leave $700, a good safe balance, over at the end of the year in the treasury.

Of course these figures are given as a sample of what might be done—not what actually would be done. Organization on this scale cannot be established all at once. It will hav to begin small, with few assistants on low salaries, and grow by degrees.

THE EGO—WHAT GOOD?

But what advantage will it be personally to any Liberal to send contributions and make sacrifices to promote mental liberty and aid such organizations as the Liberal League? In a word, what will he get for it? Well, these following are the advantages, and they are great. They are worth all the contributions and all the sacrifices if they can be secured.

First. If the Liberals of this country can bring about taxation of church property they lighten their own taxes. They make that property pay which now pays nothing, and in that proportion relieve their own property which now pays more than its share.

Second. If they can remove theologic books and religious exercises from the public schools, the minds of their children will no longer be warped and tainted with error requiring constant watchfulness at home to counteract and eradicate it, even if the taint of it ever can be removed.

Third. If they can take the administration of the laws out of the hands of religious societies, or still better, repeal the obnoxious laws themselvs, they can subscribe for a Liberal journal and hav it sent to them without imprisoning its editor. They will then be placed on the footing of the most favored subscribers, along with those of the New York Observer, Evangelist, or Christian Advocate, whose editors can publish tracts, Bibles, and other obscenities without being arrested, tried, and imprisoned by agents of vice societies.

Fourth. If the Liberals can secure abrogation, or great modification of all the superstitious part of the Sunday laws, all the people will be free men and women on Sunday, free to travel, to go on excursions, visit parks, libraries, worlds' fairs, seaside resorts, churches, theaters, or stay at home, just as they please. Now the Sunday laws shut up theaters, libraries, museums, worlds' fairs, and, in many states, stop the excursion steamers and rail trains, so that you cannot move unless they let you.

Fifth. They will feel that they belong to a great, growing, educativ organization which is breaking the fetters of superstition, enlightening minds, spreading humane common sense, inculcating principles of honor, and in all ways doing great good in the world. They will get for themselvs instruction, culture, and social life in the League; and, as it grows, and its principles and the results of its organization more and more appear, its members and supporters will be proud to be a part of it.

Are not any one of these advantages desirable to be gained, and are they not altogether worth the $1, the $5, the $10, the $25, even the $100, that this appeal asks you to contribute to the Liberal League?

The money contributed to the League for these purposes will be sacredly devoted to the objects specified. Infidels are not embezzlers nor defaulters, and those who contribute to its funds can safely rely on strict and straight accounts and an honest application of the money to the legitimate objects provided for in the League Constitution, most of which are outlined in this article. And the results will be fully published in the League reports, with credit to contributors.

Now there is not a Liberal in the United States who would not like to see these things done—who would not like to hav these results brought about; but how few hitherto hav been willing to put hands in pockets and help bring it about! They would enjoy the harvest, but never think of contributing seed. If by any miraculous waving of his hand or speaking of the word he could do it, thus magnifying himself, almost any Liberal would stretch forth his hand and say the word. But he never reflects that he might be one of ten thousand who, moving together and with one united voice, could do it.

Suppose, now, every Liberal from this day onward shall giv up the idea that he, just one man alone, is God Almighty, or can alone perform the works of such a God, but that all men and women are equivalent to what most men mean by God Almighty, and that even ten thousand wisely inspired, intelligently directed men and women are afar an approach to omnipotent power. Suppose, then, that from this day onward every Liberal will pledge himself to be one of ten thousand liberal men and women; that he will join his $1, $5, $10, $25, $100 to theirs and employ and pay agents to be the planning heads and working hands for the whole body of ten thousand, they furnishing the collectiv will, the moral support, the responsiv praise or censure, and the material aid, and the agents doing the activ practical work.

No Liberal ought to feel that he can liv in this world and not pay his share. Because he is not a church-member, that does not exempt him from promoting the well-being of the race to which he belongs, nor from contributing to its enterprises. Quitting the church to shirk paying the fare on his life passage is a poor motiv for leaving it. Contributing his $23 for years for the promotion of error, all the more he should make up lost time and increase or double his $23 the rest of his days for the promotion of truth; or never having entered the church, he should all the more identify himself with the opponents of her aggressions and help rid humanity of them. There hav been men who hav given their last precious well-remembered souvenirs to some cause great enough to command the sacrifice. There hav been women who hav torn off their rings, their diamonds, their bracelets, and sold their hair, to promote enterprises of patriotism. But in this country and now there is no need of real sacrifice. The League asks of Liberals only contributions out of their abundance—what they will never miss, but which will return to them many fold in the sense of the good it will do.

After the church, what? Shall it be the deluge? Shall it be, as they claim, the sinking of all the supports of civilization, of morality, of prosperous industry? It behooves every Liberal to look well to it that humanity receives no detriment from the going down of that long, low, rakish, privateer which has been so many ages roaming over the spiritual seas and preying upon the legitimate commerce between man and his creator. Organizations like the League in each nation will easily absorb her, substitute true principles for her errors, and steady the moral, social, and political movement as decayed institutions go down and as humanity moves on its career.

SPIRITUALIST—MATERIALIST.

The Liberalism of the United States is divided into apparently separated but in reality very nearly related camps. They may be commonly designated under the name of Spiritualists, scientists, and humanitarians. Almost all Spiritualists are dissenters from the church and heartily approve the Liberal League platform. All the others are a little more vehemently dissenters from the church, and heartily approve of the conduct of this life and views of this world which the Spiritualists cherish. They differ solely and only concerning other worlds than ours. It would seem that these hosts might amicably unite on movements and measures concerning the affairs of this world on which they do agree, and press their affirmations on the one hand that "death does end all," and on the other that "eternity ends nothing" elsewhere than in conventions and journals where both meet for a common purpose. United, these hosts would be invincible. The Spiritualists hav a high estimate of organization. They do form societies, hold conventions, pay speakers; and it is desirable that all Liberals should import more of this organizing element into their camp. The present directors of the League make no issue on the questions debated between these Liberal camps. They hav many friends in each and all, and will try to hold the scales impartially between all. These solicitations for contributions to the League fund are sent to Liberals, including Spiritualists, in the hope that all will respond for the purposes mentioned, and that all shall reap the reward of secular liberty as far as we achieve it.

Now this article is not written merely for holiday pastime to amuse a reader for an hour and then be forgotten. It is written for a high and holy purpose, and with the hope to arrest the attention of the reader and set him to thinking over these things day after day—with the hope even to make him sleepless o' nights and giv him no rest until he does his own duty in the matter. This is a message from the Recruiting Sergeant, and he asks the Liberals to whom it is sent to enlist. All able-minded men are wanted—all souls five feet nine by the Spiritual standard are asked to enroll themselvs in the Liberal brigade. All small minds, narrow souls, feeble wills are expected to remain as camp-followers of the enemy. Address and remit to

MRS. COLBY and Mrs. Smith closed their long and successful engagement in Rochester the last Sunday in February, the hall being crowded to its utmost capacity. Held a reception for their many friends at Amy Post's Monday until 2 P. M., at which time they left for Ridgeway to fill an engagement of three lectures. Will giv three lectures at Gasport the following week and commence an engagement in Cleveland, Ohio, the third Sunday of March, to continue until the third Sunday of April.

Parties desiring their services for funerals or week evening lectures can secure them by addressing Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith, care Thomas Lees, Cleveland, Ohio.

Lecture Notes.

Change is inevitable. From one stamping-ground to another we Infidel missionaries make our way. On Thursday, March 3d, I left the mountain-girdled town of Port Jervis on a brief visit to the metropolis and the Manhattan Liberal Club. Before this organization I spoke on the evening of the 4th, the great day of fuss, folly, and frauds; the day when a President is seated at the expense of the honesty of the people who claim to cast a free ballot, but who, on every hand, are intimidated by capital, creed, and custom.

The Liberal Club, however, is a living protest to all the follies that afflict the race. I wish all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER could spend a Friday evening at one of its meetings and be breathed upon by its spirit.

Saturday, the 5th, saw me on my way to Binghamton, one of the most delightful towns of the old Empire state so far as beauty of scenery, fine dwellings and streets are concerned; but its people, the most of them, need Liberalizing sadly. Creeds seem to hav crushed them prostrate, and it was with considerable effort that an audience of three hundred was called out to listen to my first lecture upon the separation of church and state. But come they did, and at the close a number came forward and expressed their desire for organization. Other meetings hav followed, the leaven is working, and the prospects are that we shall soon organize a fine, flourishing League in the city of Binghamton.

The local papers hav treated our meetings with contemptuous silence. To-day, however, I made up my mind, for the twentieth time, that Liberals had some rights which Christians should respect. I sallied out to the sanctum of the proprietor of the leading journal and laid the case before him. May his name be immortalized! Yet I will not tell it here. This gentlemanly editor, who told me he was a Presbyterian, at once most cordially said he would hereafter make any reasonable report of our meetings. He trusted he was not so bigoted that he could not deal fairly by all; had the matter been called to his notice before he would hav had fair play shown.

I came away with profound respect for this gentleman, and vowed that his most creditable act should see daylight through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that others might read and admire.

And now, friends, through this most excellent medium, THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, whenever read, I find makes genuin Liberals, let me say, I am in the field all the time and ready for work. Let me hear from you from Maine to Pennsylvania. I will come and giv your towns a shaking up and organize Leagues or work for those already organized, if you will only bustle about, write me, and furnish the means for work. Let me hear from the hundreds who are daily praying for the good time to come, but who forget 'tis a good time now.

Binghamton, N. Y. MRS. H. S. LAKE.

Obituary.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: By publishing the inclosed funeral oration you will greatly oblige a very large number of friends of the deceased. Bro. Weed was a Radical of the strongest kind, and an ardent admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor. He was one of your earliest subscribers, and he stood by you when others became frightened and denounced you as too radical.

Bro. Weed was liked by everybody except the extreme religionists, whose favor he did not court, and whose opinions he handled with bare hands.

The funeral ceremonies were a credit to the cause. The oration, singing, and exercises were acknowledged, even by Christians, to be successful. "The Truth Seeker Collection" is very useful for such occasions. There was an immense assemblage, considering the inclement weather, the ground being covered by from five to six feet of snow, and the roads badly drifted.

Mr. Weed was fifty-eight years old, and was born in New York state.

I hope that the Patch Grove Liberal League will send you their resolutions passed on the sad occasion.

The oration was delivered by Mr. David O. Perrin, of Bloomington. Yours for the truth,

F. J. SCHELL.

Bloomington, Mich., March 6, 1881.

ORATION DELIVERED AT THE FUNERAL OF JESSE T. WEED.

"All that liv must die,
Passing through nature to eternity."

The pale conqueror is no respecter of persons. He enters the palaces of kings, the halls of the mighty, and at his command those crowned heads are bowed, those haughty spirits are subdued—he takes them for his own. He knows no earthly titles, no earthly powers, and he pauses no more for the righteous than for the wicked. All must submit to his ordeal.

The exalted and the humble, the strong and the weak, the rich and the poor, the learned and the ignorant, the good and the bad, together and indiscriminately, he returns to the dust. He is not content with the "bearded grain" in the sheaf, he gathers the flowers. Blind to beauty, blooming youth as well as hoary age must bow before him. Unsparing of virtue, he strikes the babe in its innocence, the blushing maiden in her purity, the philanthropist in his charity, as well as the most hardened and forsaken wretch of wickedness and crime.

We all are in the hands of Mother Nature. She givs us our existence, and when life's fitful dream is o'er, she takes it back again and folds it gently to her bosom. Death, like birth, is but a process of our being. It is one of nature's laws, as irrevocable as it is fearful. Did I say fearful? Nay, to many a poor and sorrow-laden being, struggling beneath the awful load of misery and woe, hampered and harassed by the rebuffs and disappointments of fickle fortune, it is indeed a pleasing and a soothing balm.

"To die; to sleep;
No more, and by a sleep to say we end
The heartache and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to; 'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished."

And wished, alas! by many. Others there are, born in the lap of plenty, in the atmosphere of peace, health, and happiness, and still others, and more than all, the cowards of conscience, who pause before the awful thought of what may come "when we hav shuffled off this mortal coil."

It is natural for man to try to lift the mystic veil which hides from view the future. It is natural for man, thoughtful man, to hav his opinions and advance his theories as to that state which follows death. Yet it is a problem which has baffled and perplexed the master minds of all ages and all countries. Science is impotent. It has discovered many of the most important laws of nature, revealed the secrets of electricity, and unraveled the mystery of the stars; but on the shores of futurity it has ever stood blindfolded, and the great question remains a matter of opinion still. Science has demonstrated the indestructibility of matter. That we shall exist beyond the grave is certain, but in what manner or form we know not. "Life," says the eloquent orator, "is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities." Yea, 'tis a little isthmus connecting the mystic continents which lie behind the points of birth and death. "We strive in vain to look beyond the hights," we seek and fail to know the future, for it is "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns."

We meet to perform our last and saddest duty to one who lived and died a fearless man, who professed no knowledge of the hereafter, no faith in the Christian theory, but was content to stake his future upon the honor and uprightness of his present. At the request of his family, his friends, and those who loved him I am here to speak to you of the departed, and although I can but feel somewhat out of place, it is a task from which I do not wish to shrink, for it is ever pleasant for me to pronounce the praise of the man who is a man, who is not afraid to think for himself and to speak his thoughts, however unpopular his opinions may be, or even discordant with my own.

He whose remains you are about to lay in the cold, cold grave, was a faithful husband, and an indulgent father, an obliging neighbor, and an honest man. Though he was rough in exterior his was a kind and tender heart which went out to the wail of distress, no matter from whom or whence it came. His house was the house of hospitality, and all felt free and welcome round his hearth. Charitable, none ever left his door in want when it was in his power to help. A patriot and a lover of liberty, during the dark hours of rebellion and slavery he was on the side of union and abolition. He rose above all superstition. His god was the god of nature, and to do good was his religion. He was honest and frank, and of all things he despised, the worst, by far the worst, was groveling hypocrisy. He courted no popularity, feared no one's opinion, and was outspoken to a fault. In those early days when to be a Liberal was to be almost alone in the world, excluded from society, and an object of mingled hatred, scorn, and pity, he fearlessly went his way, and remained alone the master of his mind. He preferred the storm and tempest of free thought and free action to the dead calm of ignorance and faith, and he lived to die surrounded by friends, to see his opinions at least respected, and his cause becoming popular.

He had his faults, as we all hav, yet e'en his faults "inclined to virtue's side." True, his rude manners and rough, profane expressions would not stand the test of politeness, but after all they meant nothing, only that he was good natured, cheerful, frank, and fearless, and oftentimes they were the harbingers of good and manly deeds to follow.

But our friend has crossed the river. We are about to drop the curtain which is to hide him from our eyes forever more. When we look back at his honorable life, when we consider the good he has done, is there, can there, be one among us who thinks that his end is eternal punishment? Away with the cruel, absurd, and awful thought! Belief is based upon evidence. No man of good sense can believe when he sees, or thinks he sees, evidence to the contrary, and if there is a God in heaven, believe me, he is not such a cruel tyrant as to condemn a good man on account of his opinions, which he is as powerless to change as he is to change the color of his hair or the hight of his stature.

But I will say no more. "Honor's voice does not provoke the silent dust," and no words of mine can soothe "the dull, cold ear of death." Let us remember his manliness, forget his faults, and, returning our lamented neighbor to the arms of nature, whose son he was, bid him one long and everlasting farewell, and peace to his ashes.

Reply to Mr. Pillsbury.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The closing paragraph of Parker Pillsbury's letter, in your last number, reads as follows: "One thought more, and charge your readers not to forget it. Exactly as the Democratic party gave itself away to slavery and slave-holders after the administration of John Quincy Adams, just so since the abolition of slavery has the Republican party made itself the subtle, willing, unscrupulous ally of moneyed monopoly, until now the rule of the controlers of the cash is becoming more intolerable than was ever the reign of the 'lords of the lash.'"

Permit me to inquire of Mr. Pillsbury, or any other person, whether there is any evidence to show that the Republican party is now any more the "subtle, willing, and unscrupulous ally" of the money power since the abolition of slavery than the ruling element in it was before that time?

Did not the moneyed monopolists adopt Abolitionism merely to gain their ends? and hav they not always been the governing element in the Republican party? What could the Abolition party alone, organically and simple, hav done? It fraternized with monopoly, and Mr. Pillsbury admits it to be "more intolerable" than the other evil he fancies was remedied. It is a pity to hav virtue thus rewarded. Yours, N. EGGLESTON.

Life Membership in the Leagues.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Bro. Burdge has struck the right key-note. Ten dollars is enough to secure a life membership in the League. Liberalism is for the whole people, not for aristocrats alone. We want the independent many, not the high-toned few. Let us hav the change in the condition of life-membership effected as soon as possible. I would suggest that the board of directors in issuing the call for the fifth annual congress giv notice that such an amendment of the Constitution will be proposed for action at that congress. The vote of three-fourths of the qualified members present is requisit to secure the adoption of an amendment.

But friend Burdge should remember that the Liberal League Constitution was not framed by the "commonality." Its framers hav vanished. The League had become too "plebeian" for them. It actually proposed to do some practical work, to attempt the removal of some popular evils. This would never do, our motivs would be "misconstrued." Let us reduce the life membership fee from twenty-five to ten dollars. Who seconds the motion? E. C. WALKER.

Book Notice.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Permit me to call the attention of your numerous readers to the "Outlines of Phrenology," published by yourself, its author F. E. Aspinwall, M. D., of Loudonville, N. Y. The work, as its title indicates, is a useful text-book for students of phrenology, its chart being the best for the use of practical phrenologists that the writer has ever examined. It requires but a little outlay of time and labor to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology, and this little book is singularly adapted for that purpose.

All the popular phrenologists hav been consulted, and though not departing widely from their conclusions, the careful author has seen fit to introduce one faculty, viz., "Temperature," which is not treated in any other chart. The tables explain themselvs, and any one desirous of rounding out a symmetrical development, which can only be effected by restraining very large faculties and cultivating small ones, should not be ignorant of his own phrenological organization and the rules necessary for its perfection so briefly yet graphically laid down in this comprehensiv work. Price, 75 cents. Sold by D. M. Bennett. So much in so little. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Letters from Friends.

BELVIDERE, March 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find draft for $3.25—three dollars to apply on subscription and twenty-five cents for Ingersoll's lecture on "What Must We Do to be Saved?" Please put me down for five dollars for your trip around the world.

Very respectfully, J. Y. CROSBY.

AUBURN, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You can count me one of the requisit number who will giv $5.00 when called for toward sending you around the world on the terms you offer.

With my kindest wishes for your prosperity and happiness, I remain, Fraternally yours,

C. B. TUCKER.

LAVETA, COL., March 3, 1881.

Inclosed find five dollars—three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER; one and a half for the "Infidel Abroad," the remainder for Ingersoll's "What Must We Do to be Saved?"

Put me down for $5.00 for your trip around the world, to be paid when wanted.

Respectfully yours, F. A. MOORE.

BRADFORD, PA., March 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You may place my name on your around-the-world list for $5. Hoping to help swell the numbers to the amount desired, I remain, Yours truly, JAMES H. HARDISON.

DUDLEY, ILL., March 7, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find money order for $15.00. Please credit (on around the world) to Lewis Shrader, $5.00; Philip Brinkerhoff, $5.00; M. Rowe $5.00, all of Dudley, Ill. Ever yours,

MARK ROWE.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., March 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order for $4.00—$3.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $1.00 on account. I send this money because you hav been persecuted and for the cause. May the devil help you, and if you lack anything to send you around the world I can help you.

I will send you my hobby sometime.

Yours, D. S. VANDERWERT.

TUSTIN, MICH., Feb. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am a lover of liberty, but a poor man. If my pledge for the payment of five dollars toward your trip round the world is worth your while please mark me down. Respectfully yours,

D. R. MARVIN.

LONG LAKE, MINN., March 1, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find five dollars, for which please include me as a subscriber to the fund, a trip around the world. Hoping the above may meet your approval, I remain, Yours, etc.,

WILL F. BARRETT.

ASHLAND, OR., Feb. 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Should you make the tour around the world, set me down for a "V," also Joshua Beaumont for another. The money will be ready when you say the word. I would giv more for a history of around the world written by you, friend Bennett, than all the other histories that hav ever been written. My best wishes go with you wherever you go.

Fraternally yours, O. COOLIDGE.

WEST UNION, IOWA, March 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As this is a big day in the East, I send you the name of Thomas Reeder and my own for the (big) book that will reach around the world.

J. F. SMITH, JR.

TRIPOLI, IOWA, Feb. 22, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Put me down as one of them; and when THE TRUTH SEEKER heralds the announcement that "all things are ready," the $5 will be immediately forthcoming. Yours, D. P. WALLING.

PLEASANT PRAIRIE, WIS., March 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: "He who is the most slow in making a promis is the most faithful in its performance." So I read in an almanac. True or not, you may count on a "V" from me to help buy your outfit. The only risk we run is on your life, for if you liv to put your book in press, and it is as well done as "Infidel Abroad," our money is well invested. I hav kept no account, but think that if you will tell the friends that you must know by the 15th of April, enough will say go. GEO. E. ANDRUSS.

ANOKA, MINN., March 8, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: I will send you a post-office order for $11—$3 for the TRUTH SEEKER up to May 8th, and $3 for two copies of "An Infidel Abroad," and $5 to add to fund for your expenses if you go around this little mote that God put in space in six days, with all its rolling stock, and pronounced it good. If you make the trip I would like the book; if not, let the five dollars be subject to my order. If you can make the trip as interesting as your Brussels trip was, it will pay well. I hope you will hav the best of health on your trip around the circle, and may it last you as long as you liv. That is as far as I go on that road. Yours truly, W. S. RING.

ALLEGHENY CITY, PA., March 12, 1881.

BRAVE FRIEND BENNETT: Upon reading good sister Elmina's appeal to be up and doing while the day lasts it struck me that it was about time for me to sign that pledge, not for total abstinence nor for the support of orthodoxy, but for five dollars to send you around the world.

Some friends seem to think that THE TRUTH SEEKER can't be run in your absence; but they must forget that you were under strict surveillance of the church not long since for eleven months, and the noble paper came to us laden with truth just the same.

Now we want to show that church and Comstock that instead of silencing their man and stopping his efforts in favor of humanity, they hav produced a world-renowned traveler and writer—one who will henceforward deal such sledge-hammer blows to orthodox that they will yet curse the day that they interfered with his peaceful avocation; that they caused a ripple upon the placid minds of fifty thousand Freethinkers, which, upon a repetition of the aforesaid interference, might prove detrimental to the future welfare of theological institutions.

Now, Mr. Bennett, as it seems to be a settled fact that you will attempt the circuit of this globe, which was through some one's suggestion, and as some one has suggested that there be a monument erected to the memory of Thomas Paine, which will undoubtedly also be accomplished, I would like to make a suggestion. Since my first reading of the contributions and writings of that good old motherly soul, Elmina, I hav been forced to believe that she has never found her natural sphere, and as the future success of our good cause depends upon the proper education of the rising generation, I would suggest that she be called, not by God, but by fifty thousand Freethinkers, to the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and there get out a juvenil paper suitable for the young, to the end that they may see the light of truth before their minds become clouded with the teachings of superstition.

I hereby pledge myself to be one of a requisit number to donate $5 or $10 that the above suggestion be carried out. Who will we hear from next?

Yours always for liberty, J. A. CUTSHALL.

HOOPESTON, ILL., Feb. 27, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: As a new soldier of the Liberal cause I wish to take the liberty of addressing you for the first time. I am yet young, only twenty-five summers hav I passed; and, alas, I hav lived to enjoy life and extract the real happiness therefrom only for two years. Since then I hav become a Liberal, it is strange to say, from the false pamphlets printed by Baldwin of Chicago. They hav also converted about two dozen others, both men and women, of our neighborhood. How many more new converts could we gain should people come in the possession of the genuin articles, including THE TRUTH SEEKER!

I was induced to take your most valuable paper by Mr. Kelley, of Marion, Indiana, one of your readers and a perfect gentleman, who has suffered much for his true opinions. I'll never forget my friend, Mr. Kelley, for the kindness which he has shown me in his inducement. I render to him my warmest thanks, and think that he will feel repaid by pledging myself as a life subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and by saying that my little influence will soon make the editor forward about six more copies out this way. When I hav finished reading my paper I send it to certain parties or friends, who mostly feel greatly interested in the same. The interested ones I'm most certain will subscribe. They think the price of the paper too high; but let them first become acquainted with the valuable contents of the same and they will not hesitate any longer. In a matter so solemn as that of religion, all men whose temporal interests are not involved in existing institutions earnestly desire to find the truth. They seek information as to the subjects in dispute, and as to the conduct of the disputants.

Therefore, Bro. Bennett, we are so anxious to hav you leave for foreign climes to report to us that which you are only guilty of, and for which Christians, especially that sneaking reptil and filthy hellion, Comstock, made you suffer for—truth.

Call on me for $5 when you go abroad. When you get to the deserts of Africa, and become hungry, don't go without something to eat for forty days, if you hav sufficient power left to make bread out of stone, for your faith, you must remember, in an orthodox God is not sufficient to liv on the words that go through his mouth; but you can accommodate his majesty, the devil, by sending him to Jesus' superior, Dr. Tanner, who speaks of fasting fifty days in Europe, and who has already fasted forty-one days in the United States. Wishing you success in all your undertakings, I am, for truth, Yours truly,

WM. J. GLAESER.

In conclusion, I wish to utter a prayer, as I became accustomed to the habit when yet a Methodist.

PAP BENNETT.

Our father, who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy paper come, thy will be done on earth and in the heavens. Giv us this day substantial food of science and of truth, and forgiv all transgressors as Comstock forgivs you, who claimed you transgressed against him. (Contempt is none too good for Tony Comstock, the scoundrel.) Now lead us forever to truth and reason, and save us at last, as well as our beloved republic, from the clutches of superstition and utter darkness, and thine shall be the jewel with which all Liberals and truth-loving people will crown you for having accomplished the power of truth and having made manifest the glory of light, which shall shine with the most brilliant elegancy for ever and ever. Amen. So be it.

BEETOWN, WIS., March 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your friends are making an effort to hav you make a trip around the world. There is nothing I know of at the present time that I would sooner spend five dollars on, especially if your trip around the world will be as entertaining accordingly as your trip to Brussels. So you can count on me for $5 whenever called on, and I am almost certain I can get two or three more subscribers for the same purpose. Your well wisher, JAMES HUGHES.

BOZEMAN, MON. TER., Feb. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As the motion is made and seconded that you make a tour of the globe, you can book me for $5 in conformity with the terms. And further, I wish to say that I indorse the suggestion of John A. Jost, of Ogden, Utah, viz., that we should like to hav the Hindoo Bible, and all others obtainable, not too costly in time or money. What we Liberals of the West want are the bottom facts. And in this connection I wish to say (speaking for Montana) that we stand sadly in need of Liberal lecturers. To my knowledge there has never one entered our territory. We hav a population of nearly forty thousand, and as Liberal sentiment is in the ascendancy, it seems that it offers a favorable field for operations. The church is laboring with all its characteristic zeal to make a stand. And I read in a territorial paper that recently at Butte City thirty-two converts were added to their fold. It is true they are struggling against heavy odds, as they themselvs hav acknowledged in my hearing. Nevertheless they work away with an ardor which would be commendable, if directed in the pursuit of truth.

Now this suggests to my mind the propriety of placing some of our lecturers in the field here, to counteract the influence of the clergy. And to this end I shall propose that in the event a sufficiency of money shall not be subscribed for the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to make his tour of the world, the money will be paid in as originally intended, and make up a fund to be use in hiring lecturers to visit the West and other isolated localities.

Under the above considerations, I am perfectly willing to let my subscription stand, to be used in that way; and if in the West such a proceeding shall not seem practicable, or meet with the approbation of others interested, or the required sum shall be raised for the tour of the world, then I am willing to subscribe to a fund to be appropriated to the hire of lecturers as aforesaid, and will agree to collect every dollar within my power from those who are willing to subscribe in my locality.

The church is always on the alert, sending her missionaries to every nook and corner of the earth. They hav been here from the very pioneer days of the territory. Then I say, how it is possible for the cause of truth to progress as it should without creating a fund to be used in the dissemination of its developments? However, I am well aware of my limited understanding of what the Leagues are doing or their object. I only began taking THE TRUTH SEEKER the first of last August, and consequently know but little of what was done prior to that time. All that I reason from is the absence of Freethought lecturers in the West, where I know they are badly needed.

And now as others hav indulged in suggestions, will you pardon me for doing the same? If so, I shall suggest that if you should conclude to make relic hunting a feature of your rambles, and should run across any of the descendants of Balaam's ass, send them home; they will make illustrious professors of theological colleges, as well as pulpit ornaments. And if by chance you should ramble in the wilderness and find one of Israel's scapegoats, let us hav that too. The importance of this relic naturally suggests itself. It will be a valuable contribution to the vice society. Anthony Comstock can most appropriately be packed on its back, and driven in the wilderness when in search of official business, and thus get rid of the sins of the Young Men's Christian Association.

There are many more relics that I think would be valuable contributions to the church, but I will not bother you with them now.

In conclusion, I want to say that I read in my last number of the New York Herald of "a miracle in Maine"—the cure of a little girl near Portland who was afflicted with some loathsome disease. The cure was effected by passing her over a donkey every morning for nine mornings, at the same time repeating the words, "In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." It seems that the donkey died, but what became of the other three I presume has not been ascertained. But the question with me is, from whence came the curativ properties? If from the donkey, why should he not be a victim of especial Christian worship, or at least as much so as any of the other three. And if mutually from the four, then why does the donkey not deserve a place in the trinity and make a quartet of it? If the donkey has any friends, I insist that they will prove themselvs recreant to duty if they do not make a vigorous effort to hav him placed at the right hand of God, where he can enjoy the felicity of being surrounded by the holy angels. Your friend, THOMAS BURK.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., March 6, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: That pet scheme of mine, to which I hav alluded, is this: About three months ago, while looking for rare relics and curiosities, I discovered in an auction house in this city what I hav every reason to believe is the original old time-piece used at the creation during those few days before the sun was placed in the firmament. As a matter of course I found it in rather a dilapidated condition, and showing unmistakable evidence of very rough usage from an angry somebody. From the most careful investigations that I could possibly make I hav only so far been able to trace it down to that memorable battle of Gen. Joshua, where it did most excellent service while the sun stood still during one of those bloody engagements of ancient times.

On the strength of my researches, I hav been offered the very modest sum of two hundred thousand dollars for a one-fourth interest in this wonderful old cloud-disturber, but which at present remains unaccepted.

I now deed you, for the sum of one dollar, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, a one-fourth interest in this rare old time-piece, hoping that it will be some inducement for you while on your travels and investigations around this little planet, earth, to remain a short time in that wonderful country which Jahveh used frequently to visit and take an activ part in the broils and turmoils incident to those times, where were located the delightful grounds and, I presume, beautiful summer residence of the celebrated Adam family, and which they possibly might hav enjoyed for ages had it not been for their intense love of apples, the love of which, at that remote period, must hav been considered the root of all evil.

I would suggest to you that while there you make diligent inquiries concerning the old sun regulator of antiquity, and if you should succeed in bringing it over from Gen. Joshua's memorable battle down to about two hundred years ago, when it came into the possession of the ancestors of the present owner, our fortunes will be secured beyond a doubt. There is millions in it. What say you to this enterprise?

Yours truly, RALPH HELM.

JANESVILLE, WIS., March 1, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I believe that my subscription just expired, and I will renew for four months. I would gladly send you three dollars, but I hav only one dollar to spare just now, but hope to hav another at the end of four months. I want to do the little that I can to support your fearless journal, and wish that I could do much more.

The Liberals about here of my acquaintance are mostly Unitarians and phenomenal Spiritualists, who feel little interest in what I call radical Liberalism, and support papers chiefly of their school of thought.

I am a Spiritualist who feels an interest in every shade of Liberalism, and see no good reason why we cannot all work together in unity in matters of material reform.

I was greatly pleased with your letters of travel, but still I do not favor the idea of sending you on a trip around the world. The same amount of money donated to the cause of Liberalism here at home, it seems to me, would result in greater good both to you and your paper, and to Liberalism as well; but I may be mistaken.

Please giv my best respects to Mrs. Bennett, whom I once called to see when you were in prison.

Fraternally yours, ELVIRA WHEELOCK.

THE VINYARDS CALL FOR LABORERS.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In a late cummunication I objected to the proposed trip of D. M. Bennett around the world. Although in the minority, and a novice, I see unwisdom in sending him from the helm where and when so much needed.

This is a year of unusual events and phenomena of the physical globe. Physical conditions evolute a corresponding mentality; one is safe, therefore, in anticipating mental revolutions and social upheavals. Hav not Liberals of all shades, phases, and conditions something of greater moment demanding time, energies, money, action than to plan voyages and quietly read letters of foreign travel? Were the battle of freedom actually won and victory declared and conceded, the position would be far different. Then, like the wearied Trojans rescued from shipwreck and perils on Carthage's green shores, we might recline on mossy greensward, read of foreign lands of which our embassador extraordinary might eloquently narrate, and enjoy the well-earned repose. These things are not now to be thought of, much less enjoyed. Our common foe, orthodoxy, Christianity, is activ, vigilant, untiring; it adopts any and all tactics. The church has become a great social organization; its edict is almost supreme. Strangers are sought and welcomed and treated with the utmost courtesy so long as they are not known to entertain pronounced views. And in justice let me say that some are even then magnanimous, for human nature is grander than all creeds. And did we not know the sting of the monster, had we not felt its cruel fangs, its potency and tendency to ostracize, its power of exclusion, the brand it is wont to stamp upon one who dares to think and decide and refuse to be coerced within its fold, we too should think it a pretty good institution. Its face is comely, its surface manners persuasiv and winning, but oh, of its unrelenting persecutions when one dares oppose its edict, let its own history speak!

You, Mr. Editor, hav espoused the cause of secularism, hav avowed your enmity to church persecutions of past and present phases. To do battle against this powerful foe your energies are demanded at home. Note the late action of the M. E. church at Syracuse, N. Y. The "God in the Constitution and Jesus Christ as the sovereign ruler of the universe" scheme will yet be foisted upon our government unless vigilantly warded off at every attempt. Leave not your post of duty; entertain not the proposed trip, though honors entice with loving persuasion. Rather summon your cohorts, let the writer wield his pen and the speaker proclaim from the rostrum, the guard be on duty, until the Comstock postal acts are expunged from the national statutes. and every state shall hav erased from her constitution such odious, barbaric enactments as those cited by Judge Comegys, of Delaware, under which statute he counseled the grand jury to indict Col. Ingersoll, and whose instructions had doubtless been followed out had a less noted person than the Colonel been assailed. Our liberties are jeopardized on every hand, the press is subsidized and intimidated, free speech is gagged, a premium is awarded falsehood and dishonesty; truths of physiology, of sociology, for which humanity groans in agony, are withheld lest their promulgators be arraigned upon the false plea of obscenity, made possible under the Comstock laws. True, Colgate of the vice society advertised his vaseline with impunity, but let the poor, enfeebled, overburdened wife and mother, already burdened with too many offspring, seek counsel or aid whereby she may be rescued from forced maternity, agony, and misery worse than death, and woe unto her and her alleviator if the knowledge of it comes to Comstock and his Christian cohorts!

Nothing for Liberals to do but send their captain abroad, and they quietly sit beneath the vine and read of his observations? Liberals, the vinyard calls for earnest and faithful laborers.

Permit a suggestion. Let any one who has proposed a contribution for the trip around the world giv five or ten dollars to aid the spread of the gospel of Freethought in America. Let there be not only two hundred Liberal Leagues, but five hundred working, activ Liberal Leagues, before the close of 1881. I hav no wish or money to speed Dr. Bennett from home, but even though a widow of limited means, with a daughter to educate and support, I will cheerfully giv five dollars to aid in the dissemination of this gospel of Freethought, will do missionary work in the future as in the past. My love for and adoption of the gospel of liberty has set me at variance with the members of the paternal family, and has caused those of ample means to withhold pecuniary aid and to assume the air of "I am holier than thou." I hav paid a dear price for accepting and championing the cause of liberty, freedom for all; but the blessed truth shone upon my soul, dispelling superstition, felling altars and shrines, and slaying the priests at their official rites, annihilating gods, devils, and burning hells, and upon these ruins reared in outline a glorious humanity, which love, reason, and wisdom shall direct, and whose inheritance shall be a future life of unending progression.

The love of Liberty, progression, and truth once born in the soul, new possibilities come trooping in throngs, spanning life with rainbows of golden promises; disappointments are brooked on every hand, sustained by the unfaltering trust that each struggle manfully borne is a step upward and onward; stronger to-day for the trials of yesterday, that seeming evils are oft blessings all.

Another reason, and of import, why Mr. Bennett should not go abroad is that his wife is fast nearing the eventide of life. She needs the sunshine, the warmth and joy, with which only the husband can infill and enzone the home. Uncomplainingly she endured his prison exile, while her days and nights were Gethsemanes. With true womanly pride to see her hero laurel-wreathed, she cheerfully bade him speed over the wide Atlantic. It would be asking too much of her to endure another separation fraught with anxieties and arduous duties.

One more item demaning action—the infrequency of Liberal bequests is notable. THE TRUTH SEEKER should be placed upon a sound financial basis; Liberal schools and colleges should be founded and maintained. Let every reformer who at demise will be possessed of $100, $1,000, or $10,000 bequeath the same in furtherance of the above object, thus making Liberalism a mighty power in the land, that its banners may fan the breezes of this continent, and millions with enfranchised souls shall proudly flock to its standard.

Now that hostilities are declared, let the campaign be wisely, judiciously planned and executed; our major-generals, captains, lieutenants of brave, loyal hearts be on the march and in the field, our missionaries as omnipotent as priests, laymen, and elders; teach the masses that all creedal religions were born of barbarism, that their potentates fatten upon the superstitions, ignorance, toils, and hard-earned wages of those who toil in fear and oppression. Let man-made gods and devils flee away to their natal caverns and vanish forever, like the dissolving ghost, in the mist that floats upward.

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

THE PAINE MONUMENT.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., March 12, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I think this is an important step in the right direction. Now invite every newspaper in the country, both Liberal or otherwise, to extend the invitation, so that every man, woman, and child will hav an opportunity to subscribe, and I would like to see every person in possession of something as a token of having helped in the erection of this memorial to the champion of liberty. I hope every Liberal will do his duty.

Yours very respectfully, W. GORMAN.

P. S.—Inclosed find $1.00 for repairing the old monument. W. G.

GALT, ONT., March 12, 1881.

MY DEAR BENNETT: I think a little well-earned praise from your patrons must be pleasing to you, though I hope your many friends will remember that you are human, and that if you should receive the full measure that No. 11 calls for, you might be tempted to don the blushing honors and abdicate.

I hope our friends will excuse me if I shall take an especial pride in passing around the little circle of friends here with this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I wish for many reasons I could put it into the hands of every family in the province of Ontario. The lender of papers is often imposed upon, not always. He soon knows whether those who read are as able to buy as he is to furnish them gratis, and I can't help thinking that those who read this number will want to see the next.

The trip to the Capitol is a worn-out theme, yet it is given with charming novelty. The description of Washington's monument, which is good for about six columns, from "our own correspondent," is struck off here with a couple of slashes of the pen in twenty-three lines, and these letters are what the masses want. They are boiled down, and we do not need an "unabridged" to understand them. It is to be regretted, perhaps, that this paper is not adorned by a good likeness of the grand old man, Chief Justice Comegys, who has immortalized himself by not letting that intellectual pagan, Ingersoll, very severely alone.

It will be in order now for orthodoxy to erect a fitting monument in his honor, with choice scenes from the Inquisition, present him with a dug-out and little paddle, a copy of "Skulls and Reptils," a life subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and then let him alone. W. D. RENWICK.

LIBERAL, MO., Feb. 27, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Seeing an account in THE TRUTH SEEKER of G. H. Walser's enterprise of building a town for the benefit of Liberals, I wrote to him at once, receiving a favorable answer. I came here and find Liberal located on a railroad in a beautiful prairie country with a fertil soil and plenty of coal in the adjoining hills, which is being shipped every day. This is a most splendid place for almost every branch of industry. The country being somewhat new, land can be bought at from $5 to $10 an acre. This is the place for Liberals, with its natural advantages and its society, which is composed of the most intelligent people, who are gathering in from every part of the United States. Persons are arriving almost every day, but yet there is plenty of room. Let those come who wish to enjoy mental liberty to its fullest extent. Our town is building quite rapidly. The sooner they get here the better will be the chance for selection of farms, lots, and business. Will not some good Liberal come here and build a flouring mill? It is a most excellent place for one, as there is no mill within many miles of this place. It is a very good wheat country, and fuel is cheap. It would also be a splendid place for a grain elevator, as there are good shipping facilities. Liberals should come forward at once and occupy these vacancies before they are taken by pretended Liberals who are orthodox at heart. It is the home of the laborer as well as the farmer and merchant, for under the care of our philanthropic leaders (brother Walser and his inestimable wife) no one will suffer.

Wishing that all Liberals may enjoy the liberty that we do, I remain

Respectfully yours for liberty and justice,

H. P. REPLOGLE.

Success to D. M. Bennett and our cause! Good news from Gotham. Hell is cooling off. Hades is not as hot as hell, is it? Yours, C. E. BEARDSLEY.

THOSE who hav read the "Essence of Christianity" by Feuerbach will want the "Essence of Religion."

A Cry.

Lo! I am weary of all—
Of men and their love and their hate;
I hav been long enough life's thrall,
And the toy of a tyrant fate.

I would hav nothing but rest,
I would not struggle again;
Take me now to thy breast
Earth, the sweet mother of man.

Hide me, and let me sleep;
Giv me a lonely tomb,
So close and so dark and so deep,
I shall hear no trumpet of doom.

There let me lie forgot,
When the dead at its blast are gone;
Giv me to hear it not,
But only to slumber on.

This is the fate I crave,
For I look to the end and see,
If there be not rest in the grave,
There will never be rest for me.

Two Ways to Liv.

Giv me the home where kindness seeks
To make that sweet which seemeth small;
Where every lip in fondness speaks,
And every mind hath care of all.

Whose inmates liv in glad exchange
Of pleasures, free from vain expense;
Whose thoughts beyond their means ne'er range
Nor wise denials giv offense.

. . . . . .

Some beings, wheresoe'r they go,
Find nought to please or to exalt—
Their constant study but to show
Perpetual modes of finding fault.

While others, in the ceaseless round
Of daily wants and daily care,
Can yet cull flowers from common ground,
And twice enjoy the joys they share.

Oh happy they who happy make—
Who, blessing, still themselvs are blest—
Who something spare for others' sake,
And strive in all things for the best.

The Christian Steed.

BY ALHAZA.

Who rideth by on ashen steed?
A phantom pale, with streaming hair;
'Mid joy and woe and utmost need
That courser goes, that form is there;
The last pale star that charmed my rest
Gleams ghastly white on his fearful crest.

With joy I held high carnival,
The wine beamed red in my castle hall;
With gorgeous robe and music's strain
I laughed away each gnawing pain.
But hark to footsteps, even then
'Tis the far-off tread of armed men.

Avaunt, avaunt, thrice warning ghost,
We will shiver the steel of that Christian host.
They hav girt us around with a ring of fire;
Let the beacon-lights blaze fiercer, higher.
What pale plumes nod to the midnight drum?
O God! 'tis the Christian troops that come.

Who rideth by through driving sleet,
Pale as her snowy winding-sheet?
I follow, but she speeds away
Like mountain mist at break of day.
Sweet shivering ghost, thou art my bride!
A pale-robed priest rides by her side.

I toiled, I heaped up precious ore;
Rich vines wept o'er my gilded door;
The fountain's drop was cool within;
I knew no spell of woe or sin.
Thou phantom wild of Christian hate,
Why stands thy steed beside my gate?

O Christian steed, the night is cold,
But thy hoofs lie deep in the frozen mold.
Come, ghostly friar, kneel and pray.
Hark, the hounds shriek in mournful bay.
What dyed the spear when the chase was won?
A Christian murdered thy only son!

What spell hath darkened thy kingly brow?
Thy cheek was red as the sunset glow.
Oh, that form hath brought me woe and pain;
I shall never know my youth again,
And thoughts of peace and pleasure's sway—
Sweet hopes, O heaven! where are they.

While Freedom bleeds, I sigh and weep;
Giv me one joy, one dreamless sleep,
One breath of fame, one gentle friend,
With me o'er pleasant paths to wend.
But the wind shrieks, like a wild steed's neigh,
As the demon's courser bounds away.

I watched my only dying child—
That mocking laugh, it drove me wild.
He fills my life with shuddering fear;
Hath he not made your heaven drear?
Laugh on, and love, and nobly hate;
The Christian steed is at thy gate.

Deeds, Not Creeds.

BY BLAKE BIGELOW.

The type of life's font soon will be
All set in the historic page,
And memories of you and me
Will perish with the dying age.

O men of wealth, who fling away
Your gold in superstition's name,
Heed but the perishing to-day,
And help the halt, the blind and lame.

And if there chance a deity,
All-wise and potent, ever just,
Can it be possible that he
Will crush thee hellward in the dust?

Better to benefit mankind
In earth life with but half the zest
Thou countest beads or teachest creeds
Or preachest an uncertain rest.

Had half the gold consumed in wars,
Fought to sustain some bloody creed,
Been used to elevate the race,
And of contentment sow the seed,
This world were not a mockery,
With hollow morals based on myth,
But a supreme reality,
And the millennium forthwith.

As of three hundred years ago
Religions seem to us to-day,
With burning witches that their God
Had not the power to call away;

Even in as many centuries more
The mockery of this age will seem;
And in as many more again
Will liv but as a fabled dream.

The truth to future ages calls
In tones as thunder loud, yet sweet,
That echo down its brightning walls,
Making the harmony complete.

Religion in its truest sense
Is but humanity inbred;
Love, all the priest mankind will know—
Love toward the living, not the dead.

PLAIN HOME TALK,

EMBRACING

Medical Common Sense.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M D.

This book is a plain talk about the human system, the habits of men and women, the causes and prevention of disease, our sexual relations and social natures. It is medical common sense applied to causes, prevention, and cure of chronic diseases, the natural relations of men and women to each other, society, love, marriage, parentage, etc. Embellished with two hundred illustrations. Price, $1.50. Sold by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth street, New York.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."
Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.
The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

Bliss' Magnetized Planchette.

This little instrument is designed especially to develop writing mediumship, also to be a reliable means of communication with the spirit world. The advantages claimed over other Planchettes now in the market are as follows; First, the pasteboard top, instead of varnished or oiled wood. Second, Each instrument is separately magnetized in the cabinet of the noted Bliss mediums, of Philadelphia, and carries with it a developing influence from Mr. Bliss and his spirit guides to the purchaser. Price, 50 cents each, or $5.00 per dozen. Address JAS. A. BLISS,

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Manhattan Medical Institute.

Established 1865. Incorporated in accordance with the laws of the state of New York. This institute, so long and favorably known under the superintendence of Dr. Kinget since 1865, is located at 317 East 14th street, a few doors east from Second avenue, New York. Having been engaged in the special practice of treating chronic diseases for over thirty years, Dr. Kinget is able to concentrate his long experience for the benefit of his patients, many of whom are located in every state of the Union, the Dominion of Canada, and the British Isles. Dr. Kinget, a graduate of King's College, London, England, is the author of "Medical Good Sense," "Sexual Philosophy," "The Natural Law of Population," and is editor of the Health Journal. This Institute is conducted by a staff of experienced, skilful physicians, who devote their whole time and attention to the treatment of all CHRONIC DISEASES of BOTH SEXES in separate departments. The Institute is well known to many leading physicians, to whom reference can be made, who will giv assurance that all patients will be treated skilfully and honorably. Among other diseases of a chronic nature, special attention is given here to those of the nervous system, as Seminal Weakness, Nervous Exhaustion, Impotency, Epilepsy, Diseases of the Bladder, Lungs, Kidneys, and Skin, Syphilitic, and Scrofulous diseases, and all Diseases of Women. Questions for invalids sent free on application.

A Series of Letters written During a Visit of Ten Weeks in Europe.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

850 pages. Price, $1.50

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

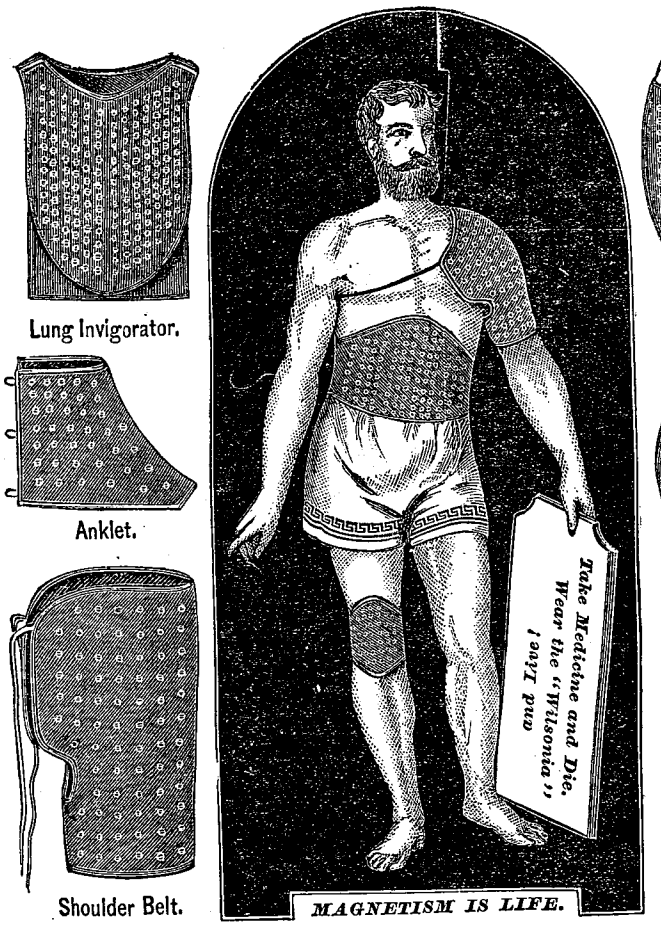
WILLIAM WILSON,



MEDICAL ELECTRICIAN,

Inventor of the "WILSONIA," and Lecturer on Electrical Therapeutics, Author of "The Trial of Medicine," "The Language of Disease," Medical Fallacies," &c., &c.,

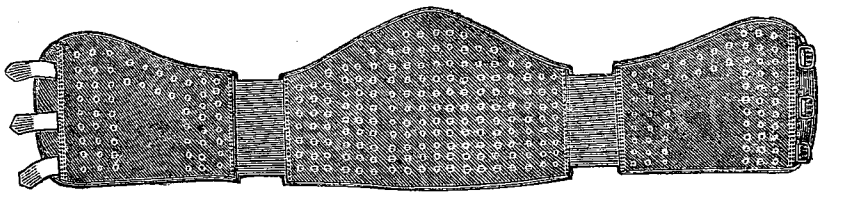
465 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN,

May be Consulted Daily from 10 A. M. to 8 P. M. Free of Charge!

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere pads or plasters which lose their efficacy in a few weeks, but are so scientifically constructed that they WILL LAST FOR TWENTY YEARS, and can be worn by different members of the same family from time to time.

Lung Invigorator.

Chest Protector.



Anklet.

Knee Cap.

Shoulder Belt.

In-Soles.

MAGNETISM IS LIFE.

Sciatica and Lumbago Belt.

DESCRIPTION OF ABOVE GARMENTS.

Each Eylet is a galvanic cell attached to a series of powerful magnets. They are light as ordinary garments, and produce a soothing yet exhilirating effect upon the system, without causing shocks or sores, as in electric belts or galvanic chains.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are the Despair of Physicians, and the Annihilation of Quack Nostrums and Legalized Quackery. Thousands of persons are being constantly hurried on to Apoplexy and Paralysis by the use of Cephalic Snuffs and Washes. Catarrh can be readily cured without any of these nostrums.

THE "WILSONIA" CORSET AND MAGNETIC BELT

For Ladies and Gentlemen will cure Asthma, Catarrh, Loss of Energy, Nervous Debility, Bleeding at the Lungs, Kidney Disease, Tumors, Rheumatism, Gout, Paralysis, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, and every form of Female Weakness.

SEND FOR PRICE LIST Containing THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere plasters which become useless after a few weeks' wear, but they retain their curativ powers for twenty years, and can be worn by any member of the same family from time to time.

Persons who read this notice may wonder that I had not advertised my discovery before. The fact is, I determined when I arrived in America not to publicly advertise until I had five hundred patients in one city, to whom I could refer as evidence. I hav now over one thousand persons in the city of Brooklyn ready to testify that my galvano-magnetic belts will remove and cure every malady known to man, except a rotten lung, and even where the lungs hav begun to decay, my appliances will arrest the decay and heal them.

Here in the city of Brooklyn the paralyzed hav been restored; patients suffering from inflammatory rheumatism hav been taken off their crutches; nerve maladies, bearing on mania, hav been completely cured; martyrs to varicose veins, whose legs hav been bonnd in elastic stockings for twenty years, hav cut away their bandages, and are now as free from varicose veins as the healthiest person living; children who had never walked from birth up to three, eight, and twelve years of age, are now walking about as other children. In short, the cures effected by my appliances seem so miraculous that the above statements sound like an Arabian Night's tale. Nevertheless, these facts can all be substantiated, and my open letter to the physicians and the Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn must convince the most incredulous that my invention is the most wonderful on record.

My offer of five thousand dollars to the physicians and Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn is still open, and will continue so to be for six months.

I am prepared to go into the hospitals and will only take their incurable cases, suffering from paralysis, locomotor, ataxia, inflammatory and chronic rheumatism, congestion of the kidneys, pleuro-pneumonia, or any disease their medicins hav failed to reach—less an absolutely decayed lung.

If the citizens of Brooklyn continue to suffer from any of the above maladies, they hav themselvs to blame.

The cost of my appliances, though seemingly expensiv, is one hundred times cheaper than the present method of purchasing physicians' prescriptions and paying for their drugs.

Send to me for price lists and testimonials, and make full inquiries of those who hav been cured, before you waste your time in calling upon me.

I court the fullest scrutiny, and prefer not selling you goods until you hav inquired of those who hav been cured.

To you who are suffering, and are now under the care of your physicians, prevail on them to call upon me, and acquaint themselvs with my invention before making any statements in regard to the same.

Note the address, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

Male and female assistants always in attendance from 10 o'clock, A. M., till 8 o'clock, P. M.

My appliances are being used with as marked success in England as in Brooklyn and New York

Gems of Thought.

A PURPOSE is always a companion. An earnest purpose is the closest of companions. To fulfil duties is more than to enjoy pleasures; it carries its own reward.—W. R. Alger.

WHOEVER knows best how to command knows best how to obey. Disciplin is not the result of mere docility; it is the intelligent perception of the necessity of obedience.—U. S. Grant.

BUT know we not that he who intermits
The appointed task and duties of the day
Untunes full oft the pleasures of the day,
Checking the finer spirits that refuse
To flow where purposes are lightly changed.
—Wordsworth.

THE idea of a miracle is opposed to the fundamental axioms of the popular thought of the present. The writers who best represent this thought do not hold it necessary to disprove the fact of miracles. They simply affirm, with Strauss, that the time is past when a miracle can be believed.—C. C. Everett.

THE desire to cease and be forgotten is the divinely natural preparation for our transition into futurity. The passion for life sinking parallel with the failing force of the organism, the two go quietly out together, so that there is no rebellion. If the theologians, with their superstitious and artificial horrors, will but let him alone, man is competent to death as well as to life, and dies in peace. —W. R. Alger.

PETRARCH said, "I conceived that to cure all my miseries I must study them night and day, renouncing all other desires; that the only way of forgetting life was to reflect perpetually on death." Again he says: "I am weary of life. Whatever part I take, I find it strewn with flints and thorns. Would that the time were come when I might depart in search of a world far different from this wherein I feel so unhappy."

MOTTO FOR A DIAL.

Time flies; it is his melancholy task
To bring and bear away delusiv hopes,
And reproduce the troubles he destroys;
But while his blindness thus is occupied,
Discerning mortal! do thou serve the will
Of time's eternal Master, and that peace
Which the world wants shall be for thee confirmed. —Wordsworth.

IN spite of the evidence which scholars and critics the most learned and acute of all time hav arrayed in support of the genuinness of the gospels, the number is nowise diminished, but rather increases, of intelligent minds that find themselvs unable, on the faith of any book, however ancient, to receive as authentic a tale of wonders which contradicts their experience of the limits of human ability and their faith in the continuity of nature.—Rev. F. H. Hedge.

THE cultivated thinker, from his hight of scholarship and refinement, has no right to express any sentiment toward his inferior except sentiments of compassion and magnanimous desire to elevate him. To fling down a bolt of scorn to beat him yet lower is to show—not the spirit of a good man. Contempt for the plebeian majority, whom Tiers calls "the vile multitude," is too easy and common in aristocratic minds, and too pernicious to need to be expressed in the writings of men of genius.—W. R. Alger.

DIDO, like all the world, has heard of the name of Æneas and the sufferings of the heroes of Troy. She can pity such sufferings from her own bitter experience:

"Myself not ignorant of war,
Compassion I hav learned to show."

The sentiment has been adopted by modern writers in all languages. "She had suffered persecution and learned mercy," says Sterne in a like case; and even in Sterne's mouth the sentiment is natural and true.—Collins' Virgil.

A MAN of deep insight and comprehensiv view may penetrate beneath the masks of things and see into the real nature of many of the delusions set up by common consent to be worshiped, but he still finds a real truth and meaning beneath the fleeting phenomena, and he accepts with equanimity the present, not as the end, but as means to an end, perceiving in it the prophecy of a completer future; he can subordinate his selfhood to the system, works quietly and sincerely in his sphere, and is moved by no passion springing from offended self-feeling to set the world violently right.—Maudsley.

WHEN we consider the low state of morals and the warlike disposition of the people at the time when Christianity first became known, and then read of the pure morality inculcated by the Christians as compared with the conduct of those surrounding them, is it not certain proof that they were only evoluted Essenes? Goodness, morality, and purity are of slow growth, and they cannot be jumped into at once like a new suit of clothes, but must be incorporated into the mentality by long-continued endeavors. Therefore it is evident that the first Christians were not ignorant fishermen, as is pretended, but in reality Essenes and philosophers, moralists and thinkers, many of whose thoughts are far in advance of even this enlightened age and generation.—Elmina D. Slenker.

I DOUBT very much whether men of science are not more truly on their knees than men of superstition in our days. Never did such candor, such confessions of baffled insight, such a sense of inscrutable wisdom and power, such a feeling of awe and dependence, seem to prevail in science as now, when so many theologians are raising their eyebrows and seeking to alarm the world at what they call the Atheism of the most truth-loving, earnest, and noble men. I would sooner hav the skepticism—reverent and honest and fearless—of these solemn and awed inquisitors in the inner shrines of nature than the faith of self-bandaged priests who are thinking to light the way to heaven with candles on the mid-day altar, or to keep faith in God alive only by processions in vestments of purple and gold.—Bellows.

A GEOLOGICAL NIGHTMARE.

A geologian did sup
Upon a new mince pie;
He swore that all this nightmare talk
Was but within his eye.

That night he tumbled into bed,
Amid his household gods,
When lo! across the counterpane
Crept fourteen decapods!

"Crustacean curses!" cried the sage,
"Hav I been taking tods?"
But as he spoke his pillow swarmed
With tedradecapods!

Poor man! the perspiration pours
(The kind that never fans),
For now the head-board's hideous with Nine entomostracans!

He leaps, that geologian,
He strikes the cold, bare floor;
His dream is gone, his mind restored,
He eats mince pie no more.

SHE LICKED HIM.

"Now, Mrs, Roosmyer," said his honor, "what do you want a warrant for?"

"For my husband, so much I know."

"What's he been doing?"

"I licked him."

"You licked him!"

"I licked him. Und I got right py dose."

"How do you make that out?"

"Ven I told you then you find out. I fix his dinner so he go py his vork. Then he catch his hand pehint und say he got a pain in his pack. So he lie down on the lounge und groan like he vas very pad. Ven he feel petter it vas too late to go py his vork, so he say he gom to the greek und catch some fish. He don't gom pack before it vas nighdt, und all the fish vat he vas got vas a meeserable leedle bull-head vat you couldn't gount; put he schmells like some peer parrels more ash twenty times. Und den he say,

"'Vat for supper ain't ready?'

"I tell him, 'You schplit some of dose fire-vood und I talk mit you.' Then he catch by his arm und screams,

"'Oh! I got the roomaticks!'

"'So you can't schplit some vood?' I say.

"'Nein; oh! dose roomaticks! dose roomaticks!' he kept on grying.

"Then I vas madder as you think. Und I say: 'Ven yon told me you got a bain in your pack, I say noting. Und ouf you got dooble up on account you got some of dose roomaticks, I say it vas all right. But, py golly, ouf you got dose pain in the pack und dose roomaticks vat don't gom only ven you got some vork, then I lick you on sight!'"

"Very well, if you licked him what do you want a warrant for?"

"On account he shall pe locked up und oud the vay so I put schmearcase on my own pread, py shimmeny! Vat you thinks?"

THE ONE-LEGGED MAN.

"I never advise a man to leave his own town," he said to the small crowd surrounding him at the Union Depot the other day, "but if any of you are bound to change locations, Oregon is the country to go to. I am now on my way back there, and there's nothing you can ask about Oregon that I can't tell you."

"How's the climate?"

"Superb. It's never too cold nor too hot. Providence watches the weather out there like a hawk."

"Lots of Injuns?"

"Yes, but they can't do any damage. Providence always givs the settlers ample warning, or else leads the red men into a trap."

"Some hard cases out there, aren't there?"

"Not very hard. When a man gets too bad Providence kills him off."

"How did you lose your leg?" asked a hackdriver as the conversation flagged.

"I'll tell you about it. I've mentioned Providence and Oregon in the same breath. And I want to prove that there is a special dispensation out there. I was going up the Deiros road to a gristmill one day last September, when I found a four-ounce bottle of chloroform in the road. About a mile further on I met a grizzly bear as large as a steer. I had no weapon, and I knew that I was boxed up. To run was useless, and no living man ever looked a grizzly out of countenance. I always try to make the best of every situation, and, when I found myself cornered, I opened the bottle of chloroform and inhaled sufficient to make me unconscious. While in this state the bear made a breakfast off my leg, and I never felt one single twinge of pain."

There was a sensation in the crowd, and all pressed nearer.

"When I came to, the bear had disappeared, and just at that time the Red Valley coach drove up. Providentially, two of the passengers had fallen over a precipice, so there was room inside. When we got to Brown's Hill we found a surgeon there who had been chased by the Indians that very morning, and he fixed me up in an hour. I saw the hand of Providence all through it as plain as I see that hotel over there."

"Did Providence get that cork leg for you?" inquired a mean man near the door.

"Certainly it did. I lay in bed two months, and when I took the stage for Portland we came across the body of a stranger who had been murdered by highwaymen. He had a cork leg, and it was just my fit. This is the identical leg, and let me add in conclusion that I havn't begun to giv Providence and Oregon half their just dues."

Notes and Clippings.

In five years a New Hampshire judge has divorced 257 couples.

The Widow Van Cott has failed in an effort to reclaim "poor, sin-cursed, worldly Utica."

Ten years ago the total export of grain from all parts of the United States was 72,122,398 bushels; last year it amounted to 228,539,947 bushels.

A clergyman of San Francisco calculates that one-third of that city's population are habitual church-goers, one-third are skeptical as to religion, and one-third indifferent.

A Kansas City evangelist wears bright feathers in his hat, huge green goggles over his eyes, and at his belt a can of water, with which to baptize converts before they can backslide.

Full many a maid has toyed with kerosene
And sailed to glory in a gorgeous glare;
Full many a man has poked at glycerin,
And flown promiscuous through the desert air.

Seven couples belonging to the Parsee community were lately married in Bombay, of whom the eldest was 15 years, while the youngest bridegroom was 15 months, and the youngest bride a blushing beauty of 9 months.

The Rev. John Jasper's firm belief that "the sun do move" has been pecuniarily profitable. He is in demand as a lecturer on the subject, and has from that source obtained money to pay a debt of $800 on his Richmond church.

Happy Spain! She is bankrupt, poverty-smitten, and industrially blighted, but the generous monarch who rules her can still squeeze enough out of the collapsed exchequer to present the pope with a chalice mounted with $40,000 worth of gems.

Hattie Deul, of Iowa City, has for three weeks refrained from eating and speaking. This is in obedience to what she conceives to be a divine command. She is gradually wasting away, but whether from lack of food or of speech the account does not say.

The delay of the orthodox Methodist brethren in bringing the Rev. Dr. Thomas to trial for his heretical utterances and publications begins to excite curiosity in Chicago. Meanwhile Thomas tranquilly goes on preaching every Sunday to big congregations and pocketing a large salary.

It is the formulated opinion of the Chicago Socialists' Society that the welfare of the human race demands "not only the destruction of the czars, emperors, kings, Bismarcks, and other oppressors, but also the destruction of the system of society that breeds them and makes their tyranny possible."

The Irish Presbyterians are again discussing whether it is right or wrong for a widower to marry the sister of his deceased wife. They are no nearer the settlement of this troublesome question than they were when they began it, a great many years ago. There are so few men who want to make matrimonial alliances of this kind that the discussion is a waste of time for most people.

Henry Fifer, a young candidate for the ministry, who has been studying theology in Nebraska City, has unfortunately been detected in stealing firewood from W. H. Hammond, W. E. Dillon, the News office, and others, and was caught in the very act. He also committed burglary to carry out his theft, using a skeleton key to open doors. Possibly a jury will send him where he will hav quietness in pursuing his theological studies, and where fuel is furnished gratis.

Several of the publishers of cheap volumes are prepared to put the revised New Testament on the market for ten cents within twenty-four hours after obtaining a copy. Agents are going through the country, however, taking subscriptions at high prices, and telling people that the book can be obtained in no other way. If the new word of God proves no more acceptable and correct than the old one, will not the deceived people hav just grounds to think they hav been greatly imposed upon?

Four years ago a French professor of languages was convicted in this city for having and selling indecent pictures, and was sent to Auburn prison for four years and fined $6,000. He was one of the Comstock victims. The four years hav transpired and the unhappy man fondly expected to be liberated; but no, the fine must be paid. He has not the money to pay the fine, and has to work it out at the rate of $1 per day. Thus it will take him nearly twenty years more to work out his fine. It is believed that he has already fully atoned for the indiscretion he committed, and Governor Cornell has been appealed to in behalf of the unhappy man, but Comstock and Cornell are equally hard-hearted and devoid of mercy. The poor man has to remain in prison.

The violent and unwarranted personal abuse indulged in by Kalloch and DeYoung at San Francisco was bad business from the start. The firing upon the elder Kalloch by De Young was bad business. The Kallochs, father and son, may hav been bad men—we know little about that—but shooting them was not likely to improve them. Going to De Young's office was a bad business for young Kalloch. Shooting De Young down and dead was still worse. Now young Kalloch has been acquitted by twelve sworn jurors, who had better means of judging as to his guilt or innocence than we hav. But this verdict does not bring DeYoung back to the family who mourn for him, nor put out the spot of his blood from Kalloch's vision. Both the Kallochs, father and son, preach; and it seems both practice—with a revolver!—Sun.

Of the many crimes besotted bigotry is guilty of, that of baptismal immersion with the thermometer at zero or thereabouts cries out loudest for attention from the law. This winter has produced an excellent crop of out-of-door baptisms, and a proportionate array of attendant casualities. The most recent date from Wyoming Territory, a pleasing locality approaching the Arctic regions in winter temperature, where three young women were immersed in an icy pond, and two of them were at last accounts dying from the experience. A lunatic asylum for their like, and a penitentiry for the imbecils who violate natural laws at the alleged dictates of their religious beliefs, will do more for the public good than all the baptisms that were ever performed. If the immersers cannot crowd enough business into summer months they can increase their forces and giv idle outsiders a chance.—Truth.

The sun promises to giv another exhibition of gigantic storm forces soon. For two or three weeks his disk has been comparativly free from spots, but on Friday they showed themselvs again in large numbers, picturesquely arranged in several towns. Evidently a period of unusual disturbance has again set in, and rare views may be expected with good telescopes. Whether these sun storms hav any connection with prophet Vennor's rough weather for this month is a very interesting question, that cannot at present be definitly answered. Mercury became a morning star recently to keep Mars company. All the other planets are grouped in the evening sky. Venus now shines high above Jupiter and Saturn, but in May she will be again in conjunction with them in the morning sky. This is the reason for the zodiacal light, one of the most mysterious phenomena in the heavens. It may be seen some time after sundown streaking up in the west, and reaching more than half way to the zenith.

The London Daily News' Rome dispatch of March 26th says: "The Pope recently ordered the cardinal vicar to institute strict inquiry into the sacrilegious traffic in spurious relics. The cardinal vicar has accordingly addressed a circular to Catholic administrators throughout the world intimating that no bodies hav been taken from the Catacombs for thirty years, and warning them against impostors." It should be noted that collections of bones purporting to be remains of early martyrs, freshly dug from the Catacombs of Rome, hav been shipped to America. If all the old bones that hav been sold for relics—the bones of the saints—were ground up, they would be sufficient to fertilize not less than a thousand acres of poor land, and would also be much better employed. The Church of the Most High Name, of Allegany City, Pa., is said to now hav a shipload of these remains on the way from Italy. It may be expected that any number of miracles will be performed by them after their arrival, and cures of incurable diseases are in order.

One and All tells us that the village of Hawarden (pronounced Harden) in Cheshire, though now principally known through Mr. Gladstone's residence there, has a very ancient history. In the reign of King Couan, one of the Welsh kings, it is said that Hawarden's church contained a very large image of the Virgin Mary. One summer the people flocked to the church to pray for rain, and among them came the sheriff's wife. While she was praying the great rood or cross in the church fell upon her and killed her. Thereupon an inquest was called, and the people, with less reverence for sacred things than might hav been expected, brought in a verdict of murder against the virgin as patron saint of the church. It was then suggested that, as she did not belong to their country, some variation in the ordinary mode of execution should be made, and it was agreed that the image should be thrown into the river, so that if it really possessed miraculous power it might hav a chance of saving itself. This was done. The story goes on to tell that the image straightway floated down to Chester and was there buried.

There are several queer things about the revised New Testament, the delay in the issue of which has called forth so many curious questions, most of which hav been met with unsatisfactory answers. One of the queerest statements is that made by the Rev. Dr. Angus, who is one of the British revisers. Dr. Angus, who is one of the most eminent of scholars, says that "the revised version was sent over to America in its final form, and the American brethren sent back in return a list of passages in which they record their preferences for other renderings than those adopted by the English company. These, it is understood, will be found at the end of the large edition of the revised New Testament, to be issued by the University presses." It was thought by many persons that the American Committee of Revision was simply a bobtail to the British kite. This statement of Dr. Angus confirms it. If the revised version comes over here with the work of American scholars pinned on in foot-note fashion, it is reasonably certain that America will hav nothing to do with it. Such an arrangement of passages about which there is a difference will make the revised version very cumbrous reading, and apart from any other question involved will make the book unpopular. If the preference of any individual translators or revisers are to be noted on the margin or at the foot, all other such preferences should hav been so arranged for the sake of uniformity. A clergyman reading a chapter of the revised version for the edification of his congregation will find his reading sadly interfered with by being compelled to turn to notes at the end of the book, or to refer to marginal readings at the sides of the pages, to see if he is giving his people the views of American revisers as well as British. It were better to delay the publication of the revised version for a dozen years than to issue it in such botched form as contemplated in the statement made by Dr. Angus.—Sun.

Thoughts on Religion.

BY AN INVALID, AT THE NEAR APPROACH OF DEATH.

CONTAINING A BRIEF REVIEW OF GOD'S DEALINGS WITH MANKIND AS GIVEN IN THE BIBLE, INCLUDING THE FALL, THE FLOOD, THE TOWER OF BABEL, GOD'S PECULIAR PEOPLE, THE JEWS, THE NEW DISPENSATION, WARS BETWEEN MOHAMMEDANS AND CHRISTIANS, CHRISTIANS PERSECUTING EACH OTHER, SCIENCE AND RELIGION, WITH SOME SUGGESTIONS AS TO A BETTER WAY.

INTRODUCTORY.

The following pages were not written for publication, the writer making no claim to authorship. During the long, weary years of my invalid life many good Christian friends hav expressed much anxiety for me in a religious point of view. I hav read and thought much on the subject of religion, and if I could hav seen any religious creed to be the right and saving way, would hav been glad to hav embraced it. I hav written the following principally to relieve my mind of pent-up thoughts, and hav tried to embrace much in a small space, to giv a kind of bird's-eye view of religion as it appears to me, so that by reading an hour, or perhaps a little more, the whole subject, from the creation to the present time, as it appears to me, may be seen.

THE AUTHOR.

During the past eight years I hav been confined to my room almost constantly, without any expectation of ever regaining my health. To myself and my intimate friends it is a wonder that I hav lived so long, for it is nearly eight years since my family physician, after giving me a careful examination, said I probably could not liv three months on account of the diseased state of my lungs. During this time I hav had an unusual opportunity to think of religion and a future state of existence. Friends hav been very kind and solicitous in regard to my religious opinion, hav assisted me with reading matter and many suggestions intended for my good, for which I am thankful.

Through childhood and youth my religious training was of the most strictly orthodox Christian character, the influence of the Episcopal Methodist predominating. Since arriving at manhood the predominating influence has been the same, except that I hav been more intimately associated with the Baptists. I hav never made any religious profession, but always freely accorded to others the right of opinion, and all the respect and assistance that a due regard for myself and family would permit. I am now fifty-six, and during all these long, weary years of my invalid life hav often had occasion to think that if my opinions on religion could coincide with any one of the many sects to which my friends belonged, it would be a satisfaction to me and them. The truth is, however, that the more I hav studied and thought the less I hav believed. And now, as my thoughts go back over the history of the past, I sometimes think perhaps the work would hav been better if there never had been any religion. I believe there is some good and some truth in every religious belief I ever knew or read of. But they hav all been productiv of so much that was bad and untruthful, so many terrible wars, tortures, crimes, falsehoods, and evils of every description, that I think we may be justified in considering the question whether on the whole it has not been productiv of more harm than good. To illustrate this so far as Christianity is concerned, I wish to call attention to some extracts from a sermon recently preached by H. W. Beecher.

He said: "Men nowadays call themselvs Christians, but the name does not make any difference in their human nature any more than the putting on of a white hat instead of a black hat indicates character. The external history of the church is the saddest part of human history, and if the works of the devil hav anywhere had an illustrious exposition, it has been in the history of the externalities of the Christian church. It is the history of quarrels without number, of hatings, suspicions, backbitings, and fiendish malignity, and all in the name of Jesus. . . . For the sake of orthodoxy men hav destroyed religion; for the sake of heaven they hav served the devil; for the sake of all that is pure they hav done everything nasty and mean, and this has been the history of the church as represented by its doctrins, its ordinances, and forms of worship."

If this be true, and it probably is, are we not to look for the cause, not only in the multiplicity of sects, but in the unbounded assurance each seems to possess that it is right, and the unfaltering firmness with which they believe it. But notwithstanding this is evidently one principal cause of the terrible state of affairs that Mr. Beecher so vividly depicts, in a sermon preached soon after, he tells his hearers they must believe, "and believe like thunder," or they will all go to the bad. Now is it not probable that it is this believing "like thunder" in matters of religion that is and has been the principal cause of the state of things in the religious world that he so truly describes? Consistency is a rare jewel, but certainly we do not find in it the religious teachings of Mr. Beecher. He is, however, as consistent as the authority upon which all Christians found their belief, that "book of books," the Bible. I know that in this land of Bible religions he who utters this is likely at least to forfeit the esteem and respect of a large majority of his fellow-citizens. But believing it as I honestly do, I know of no reason why I may not say it.

My knowledge of religion, past and present, leads me to the conclusion that probably the world might hav been better without any of any kind. Still I say again, I think there is some good in every religion I ever knew or read of. The great objection is that theology pretends to teach that which, from the nature of the case, nobody while living can know. Deity, the creation, a future life, with all that naturally results from an attempt to study the same, hav, through all the history of the world, engaged the time and talent of many of the wisest and best men that ever lived. The result is that to-day nothing, absolutely nothing, is really known in regard to the matter, while, if we go back to the beginning of historical time, and trace the track of religion down to the present, we find that it has left a deeper, darker, and more desolate mark than anything else in the world's history. And yet a large majority who hav lived in the past, as well as those on the stage of action, honestly believe that without religion in some form the world would hav been and would now be very much worse and unenjoyable. To a certain extent this may be true, for, as previously stated, I believe there is some good in all religions. But as the chief aim and end of all religious beliefs is to prove the character of God and his attributes, which is a subject that usually strikes deeper and takes a stronger hold on the hearts of mankind than anything else, the result is that their contentions hav been more bitter, and they would risk and endure more for this than everything else. And how foolish, so long as a little candid thought will teach every person that it is all about something that mankind never hav, and probably never can gain any knowledge of!

Those who believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God, and that it is so plain that "he who runs may read, and the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein," if they do really believe it, and in God as represented in the Bible, I am constrained to say, believe in the greatest monster and the most stupendous failure ever presented for our consideration, much less our worship.*

I know many will think this assertion embodies all that is bad, bold, and reckless, but I believe it to be true, and will make a little effort to prove it. The character of God, as represented by the Bible, is much the same as would exist if a parent should teach his children that in order to secure his approbation and avoid punishment they must be just, charitable, love their enemies, do unto others as they would that others should do unto them, etc., etc., but at the same time not only permit but teach and require them for his and their glory and aggrandizment to commit all manner of injustice, use falsehood, cruelty, malice, hatred, everything vile and degrading, to overcome those not of their own household.

The general tone and tenor of God's laws, as given in "his inspired word," are so inconsistent and permit and command things so cruel, tyrannical, unjust, and monstrous that it seems passing strange why any people should adopt and defend them.

We can scarcely imagin anything more monstrous than the destruction of the Midianites related in Numbers xxxi, where it was not enough that the males were all killed, and their cities all burned, but indignation and anger were expressed because a little humanity in the soldiers caused them to save the women and children alive, and they were commanded to kill all except "the women children that hav not known man by lying with him." These the soldiers were commanded to keep alive for themselvs.

Whenever we happen to hear of some isolated case of that kind now it is referred to as an instance of the most monstrous human depravity, and is denounced as a "fate worse than death." The Bible furnishes us with many similar illustrations, not of the depravity of human nature merely, but of atrocities committed either by express command or permission given by this God of the Bible. A large portion of the laws given in this "book of books," claiming to emanate directly from infinit, perfect deity, are of this character, and seem to be justified only on the ground of "I am that I am," and must be obeyed and worshiped; that "he hath mercy on whom he will hav mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth."

The controling idea seems to be that God does not wish or cannot compel or persuade all mankind to love and serve him, but that he would hav a chosen few as his peculiar people, and this not because of any worth or worthiness in them above others, but merely because he chose to; and all this time he knew positivly that it would prove a failure, that he would hav to giv them up and cast them off, for they were a stiff-necked and perverse people and would continue to be.

Read and consider this thing carefully, particularly that part of the Bible from Deuteronomy to Ezra, and what a spectacle! Could omnipotent and omniscient deity do all this and not be a monster? If any intelligent person can consider this in the light of reason and common sense and answer yes, he must be utterly dead to all sense of justice, love, mercy, and truth.

A great change, and for the better, has come over our religious teachers during the past fifty years; at first slowly and reluctantly, but latterly like an impetuous torrent that threatens to sweep away all former dogmas in regard to well-established and essential points of church doctrins.

Fifty years ago Congregationalists taught that "there were infants in hell not a span long." But now Mr. Beecher, who is a leading teacher of that sect, not only proclaims that doctrin false, but that there is no hell at all for anybody.

Still the Bible is the same now as it was then; and it only adds one more evidence to the oft-repeated saying of so-called irreverent persons that "the Bible is like a fiddle on which a skilful performer can play any tune he chooses."

As a further illustration of the change that is going on in the Christian world, I quote from a sermon preached in Chicago by the Rev. H. W. Thomas, D.D. (Methodist), in 1877. He said: "The doctrin of election and reprobation, that mercilessly consigns unnumbered millions of human beings to all the pains and penalties of an eternal hell without any possibility of escape, was born out of controversy, and in such times might be accepted, but there must come an after-thought, a reaction. Men will rise up and ask if the Bible teaches such things. And if told that it does, they will ask who put such things in the Bible; and if told that God put them there, they will ask who is God, that he should say or do such awful things; and, if pressed, they will deny both God and the Bible."

Again, he says: "Men must not be asked in the name of so holy a sentiment as religion to giv up reason and good sense and every feeling of justice, and lie down and be spit upon and trampled in the dirt. They won't do it, and I am glad of it. . . . They must not be asked to believe God an unfeeling tyrant, and still told to love and call him God. They won't do it. They can't do it. They ought not to try to do it."

But Mr. Thomas will remember the Bible does, both directly and indirectly, teach and command these things; and how he and others called Liberal Christians can make these admissions and still profess to believe the Bible the inspired word of God is passing strange.

It is said Christ gave a new dispensation. He did, but he also taught strict obedience to the law. And did he not say to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God?" Also that, "Except a man be born of water and the spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God?" And almost the last words he uttered previous to his final ascension were, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Also, "The wicked shall go away into eternal punishment prepared for the devil and his angels; where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched; where there shall be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth; where the smoke of their torment ascendeth forever and ever," etc., etc.

The truth is the Bible does teach all these horrible things about the devil, hell, eternal punishment, and all the long catalog of God's terrible, vindictiv wrath to be visited on the creatures of his creation, and all for doing just as he knew they would before he performed the first act of creation.

It is just such monstrous things as these that are surely taught in the Bible, and which are causing mankind to rise up and refuse longer to follow the lead of those that teach them that makes it necessary for many of our prominent teachers to endeavor to change their position. They are not yet independent enough, hav not moral courage enough, to say, We will lay by this old book of books only to refer to as a relic of the inconsistency and false teaching of the past.

The question will naturally be asked, If you reject the Bible account of Deity, from whence do you obtain any? Or some may exclaim, Is it possible that you are in so dark and debased a condition that you deny the existence of God! My answer is simply that I neither deny nor affirm; I neither believe nor disbelieve. I can see no way of knowing, therefore am content to say I do not know, and consequently on that point I hav no belief. There are some things that from the very nature of the case are past finding out, and this is one of them. And because we cannot know it is useless—yes it is wrong—to spend so much time, talent, money, everything valuable to humanity, in efforts that must necessarily prove abortiv, and, as the history of the world has shown, only beget strife, contention, wars, the disruption of national, social, and personal ties of friendship, with all the dark catalog of miseries that always follow in their train.

The Jewish wars were waged mostly in consequence of the question whether men should worship one true and ever-living God, or should they worship a variety of natural or artificial objects that conveyed some fancied idea of the appearance or attributes of deity. Likewise the wars of the Crusades and others between Mohammedans and Christians were in consequence of the malignity and hatred that existed because mankind could not agree as to whether there was one God, Allah, or three, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and these three all in one.

For hundreds of years men hav argued, fought, suffered, and died to prove this question of deity, and now know no more about it than they did when they began, which is simply nothing.

Probably Christian friends are now ready to exclaim: I see how it is! And can it be possible that a person who talks of reason and common sense believes in a "come-by-chance" world? Is it possible for any sane man to believe that the whole universe, the sun, moon, and stars, this world, with everything grand and beautiful that we behold, mankind, with all his mighty intellect and genius, came by chance? In answer, I would reply that while you say I believe in a "come-by-chance" world, you do believe in a "come-by-chance" God. Is it any more unreasonable to believe the world self-existent, or that it came into existence we know not how, than it is to believe the same in regard to a being who could create it all out of nothing and exist in nothing before it was created?

Science teaches us that a cause must be superior to any effect that it is capable of producing. Therefore, if we institute a comparison in this light, there is less reason for believing God self-existent than the universe that he is said to hav created. It is a self-evident truth that what the great first cause is or was we cannot know, appreciate, or understand. Therefore happy it would hav been for mankind if they had been content to view the situation in that light. And it will be better now to accept that as the situation and turn our attention to the problem of learning how to liv instead of how to die.

In a scrap-book I find a poem on "Creation," the author's name not given. I giv a few extracts:

"In the beginning, it is said,
God created heaven and earth.
But, prior to that great beginning,
Where was God—what gave him birth?
Breathless, cheerless, all-pervading,
Was the worldless, boundless night.
Say, how from nothing, at beginning,
Sprung all worlds to life and light?
But prior to that great beginning,
When creation had no birth,
From a lifeless, boundless nothing,
What brought the great Jehovah forth?
Answer the momentous question,
Was Jehovah formed by chance?
And from nothing, powerless nothing,
Did chance bring forth omnipotence?
And, in the might of nothing's wisdom,
Was chance's first work deified?
Was chance's first work done so perfect
That chance ne'er need do aught beside?"

The Bible and Religion of the Greeks.

The following extracts from a work of the last century, "Philosophical Dissertations on the Greeks," by Monsieur De Pauw, translated from the French (London, 1793), throw great light on the religion of the Athenians. It will be a surprise to many if not most readers to learn that the Athenians had a holy Bible, and that it was called the Testament. But how unfortunate that that old Testament of Athens was not preserved! It would doubtless hav proved itself to be as much of a divine revelation as either the Jewish or the Christian scriptures, and to-day we might hav enjoyed reading the word of God as revealed to the Greeks 2,500 to 3,000 years ago.

ANTICHRIST.

PROPHETIC BOOK OF THE ATHENIANS.

Few even of the learned are informed at this day [1793], that the Athenians possessed a prophetic and mysterious book, called in their language the "Testament," on which they pretended the safety of the republic depended. It was preserved with so much care that no passage has ever transpired, and consequently the notions transmitted to us are very confined, but the conjectures they lead to are infinit.

The work of darkness appears, however, to hav been of the same nature with the books of the sibyls at Rome, to which also the destiny of the nation was attached, according to the opinion of the priests and pontiffs. The more such a gross error was impressed on the minds of the people, the easier did the politicians attain their object by making these pretended prophecies a secret means of conducting the republic according to their wishes. This is the reason why the books of the sibyls are constantly produced in the Roman history, while at Athens the Testament was buried in the same silence with the mysteries of Ceres. Mr. Maas, a man of great erudition and well versed in Grecian literature, observed to me that no ancient author has mentioned the fatidical book of the Athenians except Dicearchus in his famous harang against Demosthenes, whom he accuses of having failed in respect toward this ineffable volume, on which, according to him, depended the salvation of the state.

Those people are greatly mistaken who imagin that the Testament of the Athenians contained nothing more than a collection of predictions by two celebrated Grecian impostors, called Bacis and Antiphilus. It concerned, most probably, the religious worship of Ceres, and was perhaps the very book carried annually in procession at the feast of Thesmorphia by women chosen from the hundred and seventy villages of Attica.

If such works, instead of being veiled with impenetrable clouds, had been examined by the rules of criticism, it would perhaps hav appeared that the sibylline books of Rome were only an imitation of the Athenian Testament, adopted to the paganism of the Latins.

MYSTERIES OF CERES.

The most dangerous superstitions of the Greeks were precisely those which brought money both to the priests and to the states. The Athenians protected the mysteries of Ceres for no other reason than because they divided the profits with the hierophants; and Aristogiton, a financier who, according to Demosthenes, was the greatest villain of his day, succeeded in having a capitation imposed on all pilgrims who wished to be initiated. When Diagoras, of Melos, afterward maintained openly that those ceremonies were contrary to virtue, and corrupted the manners of the Greeks, no person could refute him, but an Attic talent ($900) was promised to whoever would take away his life. Such was the answer made to Diagoras of Melos, for even in those days the theologists reasoned with poinards and burning coals, like inquisitors, instead of recurring to the ordinary rules of logic, which they confessed were not made for them.

. . . . . .

We hav now to examin in what consisted the pretended secret, revealed on such occasions to the votaries. The hierophants began by announcing that those who had been first washed in the Ilissus and conducted afterward in procession to the sanctuary of Ceres would inhabit eternally the delightful groves of Elysium amidst ineffable enjoyment. All other human beings were to be plunged in the mud of Tenarus and tormented forever by all the punishments of poetic hell.

. . . . . .

To prove the utility of mysteries it should be demonstrated that they rendered the Greeks more virtuous, and above all more equitable. But on the contrary, their depravity continued always augmenting, and their contempt for oaths and contracts became so notorious that, according to Polybius, not even the shadow of good faith could any longer be found in Greece. Wretches were seen perjuring themselvs a hundred times in a day, without fear of remorse, because they pretended that heaven had been assured to them by the voice of the hierophants.

. . . . . .

The most circumstantial treatis now extant on the mysteries of Ceres is that of Mons. Meiner, who, in his "Philosophical Medley" (Melange Philosophique), has collected even the smallest circumstances relativ to this part of the Athenian worship. One opinion, however, of this learned man, although supported by that of Bishop Warburton, does not appear to be entirely free from error. They pretend that the initiated were told to consider the gods of paganism as nothing more than deified men, who were consequently unworthy of their incense. Such a revelation would hav been at once extravagant and false in all the force of the terms, for no deified woman existed among the six grand gods and six grand goddesses of Greece. Without entering here into scientific and thorny disquisition, it is only necessary to hav recourse to the first elements and most incontestable points of mythology, where Apollo was the sun and Diana the moon.

As the initiated were enjoined, under pain of death, not to speak of the mysteries, those who had been victims to the hierophants dared not to complain or prevent others from being drawn into the same abyss. By such extraordinary means did superstition long succeed in preserving its energy and in extending the limits of its empire.

The grand mysteries were really nothing more than a confirmation of what passed, as we hav said, at the smaller mysteries, where the initiated were baptized in the waters of the Ilissus, in a solitary place to the south of Athens, called the Chaces. . . . To receive a distinguished place, or what Aristotle terms a right of precedence, among the blessed, it was necessary to receive the confirmation of the grand mysteries in the town of the Eleusinians who had a small river called the little Cephisus. In dry weather this stream did not afford water sufficient for the ceremony of lustration; but when the snows dissolved it became an impetuous torrent and overflowed all the valley of Iapis, even to the very confines of Megaris.

(Note by the author: This mode of employing running water for the ablution of so many thousand persons discovered great prudence. But in many places of Europe, at this day [1793], the children are baptized in filthy, stagnant water, which cannot fail to be highly noxious.)

. . . . . .

The dames of Athens, in open cars superbly ornamented, led the way in these orgies; and their amorous adventures, says Aristophanes, commenced long before they reached the place of their destination. The discourse they held along this road was so very licentious that all obscene conversation was vulgarly called "the language of the chariots."

The Besant-Hatchard Debate.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I am real glad thee has given to the Liberal list of publications one more valuable cheap pamphlet, "The Besant-Hatchard Debate," and I am sure every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will want a copy of it to lend to his pious neighbors, for it shows so conclusivly that "the Jesus of the gospels is not a historical character," and "that the influence of Christianity upon the world has been injurious," that it will only need an unprejudiced perusal to make its truths manifest to all.

Christians are always boasting of the great things their religion has done for civilization and for woman. This book proves that literature, art, science, woman's equality, and true morality hav advanced step by step and age by age in defiance of every attempt made by bigoted fanatic Catholics (followers of the meek and lowly lamb), and worshipers of the immaculate virgin mother, as well as equally bigoted Protestant believers in gods, devils, and hells.

Mrs. Besant, in her prompt refutation of the sophistical arguments of her opponent, shows us that the day has come when woman is determined to be first and foremost in the work for liberty, free thought, and mental progress, just as she was first in the work for theology when she believed it to be the greatest friend of suffering humanity.

All who believe in woman's mental and moral equality with man should encourage the publication of such books as this. Mrs. Besant's superior handling of her subject shows what an educated, intelligent woman can do in a field that has hitherto been almost wholly occupied by men.

The few closing lines of her last reply to Mr. Hatchard are so strong and beautiful that I am sure every Liberal will say amen to them:

"But we will free the souls of men as we hav freed their bodies. Instead of religion we will giv them science. Instead of heaven we will giv them earth. Instead of credulity we will giv them knowledge. Instead of fear we will giv them love. . . . Our morality is based on experience, not on revelation; on man's needs, not on God's commands. Thus at length shall the world regain its old beauty; and it shall be beautiful because it shall be consecrated to man, and shall no longer be darkened because it belongs to God."

Mrs. Besant is a woman of a thousand—a martyr to her truths, and one whose upright, pure, and beautiful life should endear her to every Liberal in the world. Her face should greet us from the walls of every home where woman's equality is recognized, and her truthful words should find an echo in the heart of every reader of this little book.

Snowville, Va. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

[From the Valley Falls Liberal.]

D. M. Bennett.

Our readers are all familiar with the history of the attempt to crush the above-named individual and his paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, by an unjust sentence obtained under the unjust ruling of an unjust judge, whereby he (Bennett) was deprived of his liberty, and imprisoned at hard labor for the space of thirteen months. If the churches, through their agent, A. Comstock, expected to silence the tongue and pen of this man by such means, they hav most signally failed. Even while in prison his pen was busy, and produced two ponderous volumes entitled, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," and since his release he has made the tour of Europe and has written a series of letters from a Freethinker's standpoint, of what he saw while there. These letters, first published in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, hav now been issued in a book entitled, "An Infidel Abroad," by D. M. Bennett. Price, $1.50.

And now it is proposed to send him on a long tour of observation—this time to extend round the planet on which we liv. It has been fashionable for many years for the churches to send their D.Ds. round the globe, so that the faithful at home might see the old world through their eyes; and now it would seem quite fitting that we should hav a chance to see the wonders of the orient through the eyes of one who does not look through the colored glasses of superstitious theology.

All who feel an interest in such a project will learn all about it by sending for a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 141 Eighth street, New York.

Editorial.

Comstock's Recent Effort.

Some intimations hav been given our readers of the efforts Comstock has recently been making to get a bill passed by the legislature of our state to authorize him to enter any house in this city, or in any county in the state, where he might suspect any immoral or improper gaming, playing, or exhibitions may be conducted, and this at his own option, without warrant, or any legal process, virtually superceding the police authorities, the district attorney, magistrates, etc. On March 23d, T. B. Wakeman, Esq., appeared before the legislativ Committee on Religious and Charitable Societies and made a plea in opposition to this Comstock bill, and showed how liberty and purity can both be preserved. His arguments are very sound and will doubtless interest the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. An installment of his argument will be laid before our readers in our next.

It is presumed that Mr. Comstock was not particularly well pleased with Mr. Wakeman's speech. He seemed not a little disturbed, and in his usual braggart style boasted of his prowess and what he could accomplish with the churches and $50,000,000 to back him. It remains to be seen whether Comstock is to rule America and override the institutions of our country. If Comstockism is our destiny, woe, woe to our land! It will take a stand more inimical to freedom than that of Russia, and would seem to justify nitro-glycerin hand-grenades (metaphorically speaking).

Repairing Paine's Monument.

The subscriptions for this necessary work hav not come in as freely as desirable. It would seem that the only monument in the country erected to the memory of the man we so much revere should not go another year in the dilapidated condition in which it now is. The following are the sums donated up to the present time:

M. Reiman,	$5.00	Dr. E. B. Foote,	$1.00
Infidelis,	1.00	H. B. Brown,	1.00
D. M. Bennett,	1.00	Rufus Perkins,	1.00
W. F. Porter,	.25	Augustus Owen,	1.00
G. S. Mc——,	1.00	E. M. Macdonald,	1.00
Wm. T. Costigan,	4.00	W. H. Burr,	2.00
Newark L. League,	5.00	Robt. Legg,	.25
John Johnson,	.25	James Levesey,	.25
John Musgrove,	.25	Robert Cardwell,	.25
Henry Cardwell,	.25	Patch Grove L. L.,	2.25
A. S. Wheeler,	1.00	Henry Felber,	1.00

D. Buckingham,	1.00	James Bridger,	.75
W. L. Hever,	1.00	O. F. Green,	5.00
Chas. E. Patterson,	1.00

These friends are heartily thanked for their liberality. Some of them are very generous. More than half of the money necessary to repair the monument has now been donated, but more will be required. The season of the year has now arrived when the work should be done. Let others who feel willing to contribute to the good cause be not backward in coming forward. If more money is sent in than is required to repair the monument, it will be used in repairing the wall and beautifying the grounds.

It is to be regretted that no more enthusiasm is manifested toward erecting a beautiful monument to Paine in this city. If one thousand persons will giv five dollars each it can be accomplished. Are there one thousand persons in America who will contribute five dollars each toward a colossal bronze bust of Thomas Paine, to be erected in one of the public grounds of New York city? If there are, we will be one of the number.

Let the generous-hearted who honor the memory of Thomas Paine help a little in the needful work.

A Birthday Reception.

On the evening of Tuesday, March 22d—his sixty-ninth birthday—Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews gave reception at his dwelling on 34th street and 3d avenue, which was attended by reformers, literary people, and personal friends, to the number of seventy-five. The evening was pleasantly passed; several speeches were made, and much pleasant conversation was indulged in. Ice-cream and cake were served. The absence of wine was observed, but the spirits of those assembled were pleasantly elevated, and the satisfaction quite apparent.

WE will say to the friends of Lois Waisbrooker that she will be glad to send to any of them, or to any one, a copy of her last pamphlet, "From Generation to Regeneration; or, the Plain Guide to Naturalism." It contains her views on the relations of the sexes, and may well be called a radical work. Price, twenty-five cents. Her address is Salt Lake City, Utah.

Two New Books.

We hav just brought out two new works which we trust will be acceptable to our patrons. The first is "The Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets," by Rev. S. Baring-Gould. As a writer few men hav excelled S. Baring-Gould, and this volume is regarded as one of his best. Tee Congregationalist, in speaking of it says: "There are few Bible readers who hav not at some time wished for just such a volume. . . . This is a thoroughly interesting book, and will be seized with avidity by all students of the Bible."

The Methodist says, "They hav the magical charms of the 'Arabian Nights.'"

The London Saturday Review, in speaking of it, says, "It will be the reader's own loss if he forgoes the pleasure and the profit of reading this entertaining volume."

The price has been reduced from $2.00 to $1.50, postage included.

The second is "The Old Faith and the New." By David Friederich Strauss, author of "The New Life of Jesus," etc. Authorized translation from the sixth German edition, by Mathilde Blind. Two volumes in one. The translation revised and partly rewritten, and preceded by an American version of the author's "Prefatory Postscript." Strauss is too well known by the readers of America to require a single word to be said in his praise.

The Atlantic Monthly thus speaks of this work: "An investigation of some of the most important questions that a candid mind can ask of the world. . . . A book which we feel sure, both from the nature of the subjects treated, the serious manner of discussion, and the deservedly great reputation of the author, will make its mark upon the time, not so much as an attack upon what we venerate as an apology for those who honestly differ from the majority of their brothers."

The price is reduced from $2.00 to $1.50, including postage. We will be glad to send the two volumes to all who wish them.

Judge Charles B. Waite's History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200.

We hav received a supply of this new and exhaustiv valuable work on the early history of Christianity. Those who feel an interest in knowing just how great is the imposition which the church has played upon the people of Christendom, who wish to know what the early Christian Fathers wrote, and who wish to know the imperfection and utter unreliability of the claims set up by the church as to the authenticity of the New Testament, will of course wish a copy of this work. 455 octavo pages. Price, $2.50.

On page 223 of this issue Mr. Wilson givs quite a number of testimonials of the cures performed by his magnetic goods. These testimonials can be relied upon as truthful. Several of the cases described hav come to our knowledge, and we hav good reasons for saying that no exaggeration has been used.

Liberal Colony.

Those interested in the project of forming a colony of Liberals in Washington Territory or Oregon will please address the undersigned at Valley Falls, Kan.

M. HARMAN, Sec. Valley Falls L. L.

Liberals of Iowa.

The chairman of the Executiv Committee of our State Liberal League has worked for the League for the past year without the encouragement he so richly deserves. He has no pay and depends on his book business for his living. He has lately ordered printed the Constitution and By-laws of the state League and guaranteed the payment of the printer's bill, which will amount to nearly one hundred dollars, and will almost engulf our best worker in financial ruin.

I appeal to every Liberal in Iowa to send to E. C. Walker, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, at least one dollar to help him pay for the printing of our Constitution and By-laws, and other necessary expenses in connection with the next meeting of Iowa Liberals at Cedar Rapids. Yours for the cause, C. W. DIBBLE.

Mem. Ex. Com. for Iowa.

New Leagues and Annual Members.

I hav the honor to report three new auxiliaries as follows: 83. Binghampton, N. Y., L. N. Bennett, Sec. 92. San Jose and Santa Clara, Cal., F. C. Wissman, Sec. 115. Springfield, La., Robert Benefield, Sec.

The new annual members are as follows: L. D. Tompkins, M.D., Cassopolis, Mich.; E. Livezey, Baltimore, Md.; Mrs. A. W. Lake, Garrettsville, Ohio; Mrs. H. S. Lake, Liberal lecturer, at present at Binghamton, N. Y.; T. M. Kelly, Oak Bar, Cal.; T. L. Jackson, Saginaw, Mich.; Walter Walker, Farmington, Utah; J. M. Harper, Union Flat, Wash. Ter.

The new League at Binghamton is the result of the lectures and labor of Mrs. H. S. Lake at that place. She is one of the most eloquent and efficient Liberal lecturers now in the field. Whenever the Liberals in any place are thinking of organizing an auxiliary League and would like a good lecturer to assist them she is the one to send for. Also, if any sleeping League wants waking up, she blows a trumpet as stirring as Gabriel's any day, and a great deal more musical.

They Hav Come.

[Though Brother Walser is a trifle extravagant in his praise and compliments, we can't feel otherwise than grateful that such a good man can speak so well of us, and we cheerfully giv his remarks to our readers.—ED. T. S.]

Books for our library. A magnificent present. We received from the freight office at Lamar a box of fifty volumes of books, as a present to the circulating library at Liberal, by that nature's nobleman, D. M. Bennett, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York. We will giv a list of them in our next issue. We thank you, friend. We thank you in the name of the members of our library. We thank you in the name of our town. We thank you in the name of the Liberals of the whole land, for we feel that this move in starting our library will stimulate Liberals all over the country to send and get books, start libraries, reading-rooms, and spread the light, "For in knowledge there is power." In intelligence there is liberty. All wanting books should not forget this prince of good men, D. M. Bennett. His generosity will be remembered by all. Again we thank you. May your days be long in the field of usefulness! May your last days be your happiest! May you liv to see the full fruition of the seed you are sowing! The present people of our town love you. The coming will extend grateful remembrances of you.

A London Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The handsome volumes you kindly sent me hav just come to hand, and their bulky proportions promis me many an evening of combined instruction and entertainment. I hav only had an opportunity to glance at my old friends, the letters from Europe ("An Infidel Abroad"), but I notice a point upon which I can perhaps furnish a little information. On page 123, speaking of the old cathedral at Dieppe, which I hav visited several times, you mention certain "heads of monsters with long necks, and we called them devils, some representing the heads of birds of prey, and other wild beasts. They seemed to be stretching out their heads as far as possible to see what was going on below, and to watch the gospel shops over which they presided. These horrible objects were probably placed there for some purpose, but I cannot imagin what it could be." It may not be generally known that these hideous figures, termed gargoyles, are placed on the walls for the purpose of guiding the accumulated moisture, as rain, melted snow, etc., from the roof direct to the earth, and to prevent the water from trickling down and soaking into the walls. The ecclesiastical architects of bygone ages exercised all their ingenuity to devise monstrous and hideous shapes for these useful arrangements, and on some ancient churches in England there are to be seen most horrible and grotesque figures apparently stretching out their necks in agony, but in reality only serving the useful purpose of water conductors. I remember that a year or two ago Mr. Moncure D. Conway selected "gargoyles" as the subject of a Sunday morning discourse at South Place Chapel. The discourse was subsequently printed, and I will endeavor to obtain a copy for you.

But enough of gargoyles, the relics of an age of superstition. I am highly pleased to be able to keep note of the Freethought movement in your great country by means of THE TRUTH SEEKER. You hav plenty of energetic workers, and our cause must prosper mightily in such good hands.

The proceedings of a body of revivalists calling themselvs the "Salvation Army" are just now affording much amusement to the ungodly, whatever the truly pious may think of them. The "army" has a "general" whose name is Booth. It has its headquarters in the salubrious locality of Whitechapel (similar in point of character to your Bowery, I believe), and it issues a weekly paper called the War Cry, published at the moderate sum of one cent. The paper is principally filled with reports from "captains" and other officers conducting the revival work all over the country, and the most extraordinary language is used by these people. For instance one will write something in this strain:

"COVENTRY, March 5th.

"Hurrah! a glorious day for the Lord! Grand field day; the devil's forces utterly routed! Seventy-five sinners plunged in the fountain, and many others promised to embrace the blood. "CAPT. DEADHEAD."

Of course I do not represent this as a genuin quotation, but I will say that every expression used therein will be found over and over again in the War Cry. The "Salvation Army" is a band of uneducated fanatics, and I am certain that the cause of true religion (if there be such a thing) is ill served by their pranks and their blasphemy.

Mr. Bradlaugh's troubles concerning the parliamentary oath are not yet over; but he is bound to win in the end, and the cause of freedom and progress will triumph with him. I was in the House of Commons the other evening, when the motion for inquiring into perpetual pensions was to hav been discussed. Mr. Bradlaugh gracefully gave way in view of the urgent state of public business. He is a general favorit among the enlightened members of both parties; and, considering the fierce prejudice which less than a year ago was felt against him, the result is simply marvelous. There is a grand parliamentary career before Mr. Bradlaugh if God givs him time to work it out.

This letter is, I am afraid, already too long, so I will cut it summarily short. I hope to hav the pleasure of occasionally communicating by this means with my Freethinking brothers and sisters of the new world. Most sincerely yours,

GEORGE STANDRING.

Thomas Carlyle.

Death has been busy amongst the Titans during the last few months. The greatest woman writer of our nation and the most notable of English authors are both passed into rest. It is not possible for those of the age that was also theirs to estimate either fully or accurately the work that each of these has done. After times alone can judge righteously those whose thoughts, reaching out into the coming centuries, draw the world onward toward the days and things that are to be. Yet is it a solace to us, if even only by way of wholly inadequate love token, to speak of our lost sister and brother, so much "more elder" than we can ever be; to place on record how we were stirred and swayed by their speakings, ere our voices also become silent.

In Thomas Carlyle existed an immense capacity for work. Remembering the position in which he commenced life and the position wherein the end of his days found him, considering the mere list of his writings, and reflecting upon the stupendous labor involved in all of them, and especially in the needful preparations for such works as the "Letters of Oliver Cromwell," the "French Revolution," and the "Life of Frederick the Great," there is forced in upon us the conclusion that the faculty of taking pains was his. It is impossible to enumerate here his labors. But to one portion of them attention should be called. The value of the work done by this man in after much toil convincing the English people that a German literature existed, and that a right worthy one, is incalculable. Before this century, German literature was unknown to us. Not altogether surprising is this when we reflect that until the middle of the last century Germany did not possess a literature of great note. Suddenly it sprang into being. Simultaneously Goethe and Schiller were at work and a host of writers only less remarkable than they. The literature of Germany seems to hav been born Minervawise, full-grown. Sir Walter Scott had by his translations of poetry introduced our fellow-Teutons to us. Coleridge by his writings and his conversation had made a few rarer minds acquainted with some of the German work, and it is to be feared in certain cases had led us to such acquaintance without a perfeectly clear account of the pedigree of the new comer. But it was Carlyle who by his translations, and above all by his rarely appreciativ essays on the authors beyond sea, first really awakened the English mind to the wealth of loveliness, strength, and high thinking that was waiting for them in the language kindred to their own.

Of the mere style of Carlyle's writing the distinctivness is usually regarded as so marked that the name Carlylese is as familiar in our mouths as Johnsonese. It is marked by an intense and picturesque ruggedness that reminds us of his own face and the very mountains of his nativ land. The odd habit of making an imaginary person the mouthpiece of his own ideas, carried to its extremest form in "Sartor Resartus," is perhaps the most peculiar specialty of his method. This habit and the ruggedness and strange involution of his style are not encountered in his earlier writings. A very interesting study in evolution is afforded to one who will compare successiv products of his pen. Such a one will note the gradual development of the peculiarities, with elimination of method after method common to ordinary expresion, with survival of method after method that would seem the fittest wherein his thought may find utterance, until in the French Revolution the form of utterance is the sternest, most unmistakable, most uncompromising Carlylese. The devices of other writers he would seem for the most part to despise. Even epigram is but seldom used, though its occasional employment is masterful. Witness in the Cromwell, "Our sorrow is the inverted image of our nobleness." His nomenclature moreover is novel enough. Scarce a history-maker or history-marrer, luminous or baleful, livs in his page to whom he has not given a nickname. Not a name of triviality, but one new, apt, meaningful, doomed to be lasting. Who thinks of Robespierre as other than the sea-green incorruptible? "The little brown-complexioned artillery-officer of Toulon" moves through the later pages of the great history also. And of happy phrases there is rich store, for the most part marked with a strange, easily recognizable individuality. Many hav already become part of the vocabulary of the many. "The whiff of grapeshot," "tempted with the gleam of bishoprics," "the temporary hallelujah of flunkies"—such as these abound.

If we pause to inquire as to his possession of the mind-moving gifts that he who would write or speak would ask of the fairy godmother the answers are almost wholly affirmativ. Are not some of these at least humor, wit, power, pathos? In only one of these is there possibility to find a want. Of that strange, sudden recognition of resemblances between the apparently unlike that we call wit, Carlyle would seem to possess less mastery than many lesser men. But his humor, grim as it often may be, is true. Even with the irony of it a soft pity blends. It sways you now to laughter, now to tears. That which he has written of Richter is true of himself: "A man of mirth, but he seldom or never condescends to be a merry-andrew. Nay, in spite of its extravagance, we should say that his humor is of all his gifts intrinsically the finest and most genuin. It has such witching turns; there is something in it so capricious, so quaint, so heartfelt. From his Cyclopean workshop, and its fuliginous limbecs and huge, unwieldy machinery the little, shriveled, twisted Figure comes forth at last, so perfect and so living, to be forever laughed at and forever loved!"

The power that he wields is terrific. Herein he rises to Homeric hights. His voice is as the multitudinous sounds of storm upon the mountains. You are awed into dumbness, infolded and caught away as by a whirlwind, borne resistless onward, left stunned and breathless, as you are by the overture to Taunhäuser or the ride of the Valkyries. For his command of pathos let it be noted how manly and how self-contained is his pathos. No childish or womanish suffering. Womanlike in his tenderness; manlike in his self-restraint. Can one read of the close of Walter Raleigh's life—"such a man, with his head grown gray"—unmoved? It is the pathos that sets the heart bleeding rather than the eyes a-weeping.

Possibly the most notable characteristics of this our strong thinker and speaker is his worship of strength. Powerful himself, he deifies power. All his human study-subjects are of gigantic force. Cromwell, Dante, Luther, Johnson, Mohammmed, Frederick—such as these are his heroes. That Burns is in their midst is not without a pathetic significance. Odin and Thor are the gods, and the gentleness of Sakya-Muni and of Christ is not honored by any noticeable recognition. To some of us it would seem that his strength-worship is carried to an excess. It appears to hav led to an infinit belief in the efficacy of the work of the one strong man to a contemptuous disbelief in the work of the people. Good can only be effected by agency of the hero. Men are to be dragooned into righteousness. With him law and authority are the saviors of the world. The possibility of men becoming a law unto themselvs does not seem to occur.

In capacity for getting at the very heart of things Carlyle is unequaled. His deep, earnest eyes see straight through signs, symbols, coverings, to the reality. "About eight o'clock the royal family fall into each other's arms amid 'torrents of tears.' Unhappy family! Who would not weep for it were there not a whole world to be wept for?" His keen glance upon an imposture is as the touch of Ithuriel's spear. The evil thing springs erect to be seen of all.

To inquire too curiously into the religious and political beliefs of one that has just passed savors something of impertinence. Yet as many earnest men and women are often sorely exercised in mind because great thinkers hav used certain words and forms of expression, it seems wise to dwell for a moment upon the relationships of Thomas Carlyle's writings to these two great subjects. Those writings abound in references to God. The name is used, apparently, as equivalent to Matthew Arnold's "tendency that maketh for righteousness," with addition of a personal, autocratic, individual strength to be expected from one who is so strong a worshiper of strength as Carlyle. I am not sure that his use of the word is not fairly paralleled by the use made thereof by Shelley. If this surmise be accurate, regret may perhaps be expressed that in this case, as regret must assuredly be expressed in the case of Shelley, some other less misleading phrase has not been used. The word god to ninety-nine out of every hundred readers of either of these two immortals connotes the being described in the Old Testiment plus the Christ of the New. Both Shelley and Carlyle might hav urged that they wrote for wise men who would understand their use of the word. But as our population according to Carlyle is "thirty millions, mostly fools," and as both Shelley and Carlyle are fortunately widely read, it is at least matter for regret that the name of unhappy memories has been in any way used by them. And hence we may all learn the general principle that there is huge danger in employing stereotyped words and phrases with meaning other than that attached to them by the many. Every use of the words god, divine, religion, in a good sense, is a retardation of that which, though inevitable, is slow.

In politics Thomas Carlyle was an unconscious Radical. That he was a Radical is shown by his two greatest historical works. The man who made Oliver Cromwell's glory at last the heritage of the English nation, who in the history of the French Revolution made the cry of a people articulate and cast the burden of all bloodshed and wrong-doing therein on the true shoulders, could not be other than Radcal. Yet I hav to call him unconsious Radical. That this also is true is shown in his life of John Sterling, written so long as 1851. Therein he speaks of the "grim desert of Radicalism." Never was more inaccurate phrase penned. Radicalism in politics and in religion is the pathway from a grim desert mournful with the moanings of wronged peoples to a promised land—a land promised by the whole history of evolution and by every event of the past story of the world. And though the desired country is not yet, the way thitherward, though rough traveling at times, is bright with the blossoms we call hopes, and is a thousand times more joyous than the country whence we journey. That Carlyle misunderstood the meaning of Radicalism is evidenced by his political utterances in later years. These hav been of such a nature that it is not surprising that one so careless in thought and speech as Mr. Ruskin should hav written the condemnation of himself and Carlyle from which all thinking folk at once excluded the latter.

It is at least unfortunate that our great teacher had not that confidence in the future that his own teaching inspires. He calls Puritanism "the last glimpse of the godlike in England"—speaks of the "scavenger age" that is coming. And yet he has himself shown us that Puritanism has founded and in its turn given way to a nobler faith. He has taught us to worship heroes, and in his own honored life has given us a heroism worth the worship. It is impossible for us as we follow him in his study of the heroic to believe that the heroic can fail. The worship of the past enkindles in us a belief in the present and a hope in the future. Moreover, he, more than all other men, has taught us the virtue and the valor of earnestness. This has been, in brief, his greatest work and triumph. He has awakened in the peoples a faith in thoroughness. No man can rise from the reading of his earnest works without conviction that life is well worth living if it be truly lived. He has spoken holy and noble things of the immortal significance of this mortal life. And therefore his plaints and groans, already discounted by his intense belief in goodness and its ultimate victory, are lost altogether in the pean his strong voice has set a-sounding in praise of whatsoever things are lovely and of good report. Neither he nor we, his disciples, can credit that the good is not stronger than the evil. His life and his words speak out this truth with loud acclaim.

To hav taught the lesson of earnestness so earnestly that the half jesting, half real cynicism of the after years is swallowed up of the stronger, truer, earlier song—to hav set some thousands of men to work at living and not existing—this has been his life and shall be his immortality. Though his sacred dust repose after solemn, silent burial in the little churchyard of Ecclefechan, the man livs in the old men and women who, aging as he aged, yet breathe the air of earth and feel their last hours the sweeter for the strength and comfort he gave them by the way. He livs in those who were children when he was the willing journeyman of letters, and who pass now through the mellowing years of life the stronger for the brave voice sounding a few years nearer the grave than they. He livs in the young hearts that cannot understand his pessimism, but find joy in his pictures of power and words of encouragement. He livs and will liv as long as young men and maidens reading his words can learn that life is purposeful and not meaningless, and gather from his dead lips power to fight against the wrong, love for and belief in the right. And this molding of the future, wherein few men hav had stronger part than Thomas Carlyle, is the true immortality.

What Objections to Christianity?

MR. MAIR'S SEVENTH LETTER.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I must make serious objection to your definition of miracles. A miracle you define as "an event produced by supernatural power in opposition to natural laws and causes, and contrary to the experience of mankind or the world." The latter clause is a mere sophism, for you declare that mankind have universally believed in thousands of miracles; they therefore cannot be contrary to experience. Neither do I believe that miracles are in violation of the laws of nature; they are such a use of these laws as human power or contrivance never could make. Dr. McCosh puts it exactly: "We would confine the word miracle to those events which were wrought in our world as a sign or proof of God making a supernatural interposition or a revelation to man."

With this definition, which is, in my opinion, as concisely exact as can be made, the stony pages of geology have traced upon them as many miracles as the pages of inspiration. Omitting the intervention of Deity which chemical analysis demonstrates took place in the beginning of matter, for science positively predicates a beginning, and the investiture of each primordial atom with its definite and despotic force, we begin with a period when the world was a globe of matter without vegetable or animal life—a dreary waste. Whatever science may finally determine was the first dawn of life—take it, if you please, a vegetable cell—the forces inherent in matter were powerless to originate it; no power short of the omnipotent fiat of the Deity could do that. So with the first appearance of animal life; the chasm between animal and vegetable life can only be crossed by the interposition of the Deity—a miracle. So with the origin of species: whatever theories may be fondly accepted, true science affirms the intervention of an Almighty Power to create the difference between man and the lower animals, and between the different species of lower animals themselves. So with the different periods of vegetable and animal life through which geology demonstrates that this earth has passed before the creation of man; the preparing of the climate and furniture of the world for the peculiar inhabitants of each epoch, like the shifting scenes of the theater, is a miracle, which, however certain minds may become enamored with Materialistic theories, the everlasting rocks prove to be a fact.

It is, however, scarcely needful to pierce the distant geological ages to prove that the Almighty is not inferior to man in his capabilities, nor circumscribed to such a limit as to be practically deaf, dumb, and blind. I admit that "God does not violate his own fixed laws," but have you, pray, such an intimate knowledge of his laws and schemes as to be enabled to affirm that this is according and that contrary to them? A miracle is above human capability, and denotes an intelligent use of laws with which the human mind is unacquainted and never can comprehend, but on this account it will not surely limit the infinite, as Canute attempted to stay the sea. But after all the alleged scientific objections which a blatant Infidelity makes, which in the slang of her school is called "limiting the infinite" and "anthropomorphism," it is she alone who degrades God and fixes the limit of his freedom.

Miracles are therefore not only possible, but the universal testimony of men is that they are necessary to prove a revelation from God. The various accounts amassed in your letters of the miracles believed by men, true or false, set this beyond a doubt. If God speaks, I can only know his voice by some special manifestations of Deity, and the most natural and the decisive proof is that he can do what man cannot do, call it, compared with man's ability and sphere, supernatural. This is so palpably axiomatical that I cannot think you will deny it. "The question of miracles" must be therefore admitted, as I have quoted in my last letter from Duke of Argyll, "to be simply a question of evidence."

The consideration arises, then, what is the proof of the miracles of the Bible, and in what manner is it stranger than and peculiar from the miracles claimed for other religions? Let us advert to the last consideration first.

The first feeling which an intelligent reader of the New Testament would have would be the moral dignity and grandeur of the miracles of Christ, which are so utterly different to those of the heathen. The latter are full of grotesque nonsense and ridiculous stories, like the tales of the so-called apocryphal gospels, and our modern jugglers perform many tricks as seemingly wonderful.

Again, the alleged miracles of the heathen were not performed to attest sublime doctrines and great truths, but for the personal aggrandizement of the performers and to give them a superstitious power over an ignorant people. They were performed, not to the criticism of the learned, but among the uneducated and in obscure places—not before scoffing enemies, but only among friends and devotees. On the contrary, the miracles of Christ were performed in populous cities before educated and powerful enemies, who were only too ready to detect and expose deception.

The accounts of the miracles of Christ were published among those among whom he was alleged to have performed them, who were living in his time, and, if they were false, could easily have proved them so. There were thousands of Christians a few years after the death of Christ, before the first of the gospels was written, who believed and preached Christ and his miracles, and Christ himself often referred to them as a proof of his divine power, as when he challenges the Jews, "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works" (John x, 37, 38). Where is there any analogy to this among heathen miracles? You cannot adduce one. Apollonius, of Tyana, was said to have performed some miracles which resemble Christ's, but note, you say his life was written by Philostratus A. D. 210, over a hundred years after his death. You say it was written at the request of the Emperor Septimus Severus' wife, Julia Domna. She was an inveterate enemy of the Christians. At this time the fame of the miracles of Christ had extended over all parts of the civilized world, and Philostratus, who derived his materials for his history partly from tradition and partly from the writings of Damis, the friend of Apollonius, very probably wove into his own story many of the miracles of Christ. A quarter of a century before this the Roman satirist, Lucian, called Apollonius an impostor and ridiculed his pretended miracles; and, according to Hartwell Horne, it was not until the fourth century that these pretended miracles were brought forward to disprove the divine power of Christ, being then adduced by Hierocles, the governor of Bithynia, "a principal instigator of the persecution under Dioclesian," and he was answered by Eusebius. Hierocles did not, however, deny that Christ actually performed the miracles credited to him, but claimed they were performed by sorcery; nor did he reject the books of the New Testament as not genuine. (Horne's Introduction, vol. i, p. 335).

But the greatest difference is that there were no ancient prophecies respecting any of these so-called miracle-workers among the heathen, or that could be applied to them. If you will show to me prophecies written, say, to prevent argument, two hundred years before the birth of Apollonius that apply to him as minutely as the Old Testament prophecies confirm the truth of Christ, I will believe the miracles imputed to him just as firmly as I do Christ's. Search the books of the world, and you cannot. The Old Testament prophecies, in this respect, are alone an unrivaled miracle and a demonstration of the divine origin of Christianity. As you probably know, all the ancient opposers of Christianity, the Jews, Celsus, Porphyry, the Emperor Julian, Hierocles, Eunomius, all acknowledged that Jesus Christ actually performed miracles, scoffingly dismissing it by attributing his power to magic, as Celsus says, he learned the black art in Egypt, or by the Jews imputing it to his having learned the unspeakable name of Jehovah. Of this you can satisfy yourself by consulting the Talmud and such of the writings of the others as have been preserved. How do the early Christians meet this? I will quote:

Irenæus was a disciple of Polycarp, who was a disciple of John, and received from Polycarp details that were related to him by personal eye-witnesses of the miracles of Christ. He meets the objection thus: "But if they shall say that the Lord performed these things by an illusory appearance, leading these objectors to the prophecies, we will show from them that all things were thus predicted concerning him, and that they shortly came to pass." Similarly, some years before him, Justin Martyr, using the prophecies as an argument, says, "I adopt such a mode of reasoning lest any of our opponents should say, What hinders but that he whom we call Christ, being a man sprung from men, performed by magical art the miracles attributed to him?" Let the reader remember in this connection that Justin Martyr was not a credulous, uneducated man, but a philosopher of great learning and critical acumen, a follower of Plato before his conversion to Christianity, and who, investigating its claims to write against them, found the evidence of their truth so strong that he sealed his testimony with his life's blood. I might also quote Lactantius, whom you refer to as living early in the fourth century, and who writes of Christ, "He performed miracles; we might have supposed him to have been a magician, as ye say and the Jews then supposed, if all the prophets had not with one spirit foretold that Christ should perform these very things." And Origen uses the same argument against Celsus.

Allow me to make a few quotations from the prophecies that are thus referred to; but first I will assume a date for them that while I myself believe it to be far too late, you will not object to. Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), king of Egypt died 247 B.C. It was in his reign that the Greek translation of the Old Testament called the Septuagint was made, so I suppose you will very readily allow that it was all written in Hebrew at least before the year 275 B.C. And let me also premise that the following are only a few verses on one topic selected, but the real truth seeker can find dozens on as many different events, each as wonderfully prophetic and exact. I designedly omit those like Dan. ix, 24 and 25, which require historical knowledge to interpret:

"The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. xliv, 10). "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God" (Isa. xl, 3). "Thou Bethlehem Ephratah, in the land of Judah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he be born that is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been of old" (Mic. v, 2). "I have made a covenant with my chosen. I have sworn unto David, my servant, Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations" (Ps. lxxxix, 3, 4). "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace" (Isa. ix, 6). How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation" (Isa. lii, 7). "The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord" (Isa. lxi, 1). "Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped; then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the dumb shall sing" (Isaiah xxxv, 5, 6). "And he shall be for a sanctuary, but for a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense to both the houses of Israel, for a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem" (Isa. viii, 14). "Who hath believed our report and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of the dry ground; he hath no form nor comeliness, and when we shall see him there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised and we esteemed him not. Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth. He was taken from prison and from judgment" (Isa. liii). "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? All they that see me laugh me to scorn, they shoot out the lip, they shake the head saying, He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him; let him deliver him, seeing he delighted on him. Many bulls hav compassed me, strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round, I am poured out like water and all my bones are out of joint; my heart is like wax, it is melted in the midst of my bowels. . . . The assembly of the wicked have inclosed me; they pierced my hands and my feet; they part my garments among them and cast lots upon my vesture" (Ps. xxii).

"He was cut off out of the land of the living, for the transgressions of my people was he stricken, and he made his grave with the wicked and with the rich in his death, because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth. Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand, he shall see the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities; therefore will I divide him a portion with the great and he shall divide the spoil with the strong, because he poured out his soul unto death and he was numbered with the transgressors and he bare the sins of many and made intercession for the transgressors" (Is. liii).

"They shall smite the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek, therefore will he give them up until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth, then the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel" (Micah v, 1, 3).

"Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate. And the Lord have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land, but yet in it there shall be a tenth, and it shall return and shall be eaten as a teil tree and as an oak whose substance is in them, when they cast their leaves, so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof" (Isa. vi, 11, 12, 13).

"And it shall come to pass in that day that I will seek to destroy all nations that come against Jerusalem, and I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplication, and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him as one mourneth for his only son" (Zech. xii, 9, 10).

"And now, saith the Lord that formed me from the womb to be his servant to bring Jacob to him again. Though Israel be not gathered yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God shall be my strength. And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob. I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth" (Isa. xlix, 5, 6).

I ask pardon for the length of my quotation. But as it was necessary for me to point out this great difference between Christian and heathen miracles that the founder of Christianity was accurately foretold hundreds of years before his advent, I do not see how I could properly have avoided it. And let me inquire, Do not the prophecies quoted read more like a history? Could language be more aptly applied to describe the Savior who was to come? His forerunner, the dignity and yet humiliation of his wonderful person, the Fellow of the Almighty and yet man, meek, patient, sinless, the preacher of salvation healing the lame, restoring sight to the blind, yet rejected by his own nation, crucified, even the gambling over his apparel, and his dying cry foretold, the piercing of his hands and feet, his resurrection, the rejection of the Jews because they smote him, the calling of the Gentiles, the repentance and future restoration of the Jews, etc., etc., are all delineated with the exactness of a historian centuries before his birth as man.

Let us now turn our attention to the miracles performed by Christ and the apostles after his ascension.

You have quoted Gibbon as adducing as a third of five explanations of the rapid dissemination of Christianity "the miraculous powers ascribed to the new religion," the New Testament among other reasons gives the miraculous powers possessed by the early Christians. Surely the latter is the more reasonable for if the powers were not possessed, but merely claimed, would it not expose the whole testimony of the church to ridicule and bring disastrous exposure upon them as impostors? What power or effect would it have upon any one to claim miraculous powers and yet not really possess them? Would any one believe, and especially surrender their lives, submitting to every torture rather than give up their faith, when no miracles were really performed?

It is not denied that the apostles claimed to have wrought miracles through the power given them by Christ. Were they wilful deceivers and impostors? If so, what motive could they have had? Not fame; they were members of a nation of outcasts and their master was the reputed son of a carpenter who had suffered a death as ignominous as a murderer on the gallows. Not the desire for wealth, nor for ease, for they braved appalling dangers, suffered gladly excruciating tortures, the sword, the rack, the prison, the stake, and did they thus uphold their testimony with their life, and that testimony false? More, they taught that liars and impostors should receive everlasting punishment in the world to come, and yet did they constantly affirm falsehood? With nothing to gain if their testimony was false did they sacrifice everything that makes life pleasant and cheerfully surrender life itself to support a lie? Is such a thing conceivable?

Again, would an impostor issue a challenge to a person whose influence he was anxious to obtain to save his and his friends lives, it he knew that by accepting it the result could only end in his assertion being proven false? In his first apology Justin Martyr writes, "That the kingdom of evil spirits has been destroyed by Jesus, you may even at the present time convince yourselves by what passes before your own eyes, for many of our people, of us Christians, have healed and still continue to heal in every part of the world and in your own city (Rome) numbers possessed of evil spirits, such as could not be healed by other exorcists, simply by adjuring them in the name of Jesus who was crucified under Pontius Pilate."

In A. D. 125 Quadratus presented his apology to the Roman emperor Adrian, containing these words, "The works of our Savior were always to be seen, for they were real, those that were healed, and those that were raised from the dead, were seen, not only when they were healed or raised but they were always there; not only whilst he dwelt on the earth but also after his departure, which they long survived, so that some of them have lived even to our own times."

And so I could continue to quote to you from Barnabas and Clement, who were companions of Paul down to Tertullian and Origen, who lived two or three centuries later. During this time and for centuries later no one ever thought of denying that Jesus Christ wrought miracles and that his apostles did also. What is the explanation of this? What works were they that were thus performed that such bitter Infidels as Celsus, Pophyry, and Julian acknowledged them as miracles? Will you say, like them, it was sorcery, or will you say that they, Infidels as they were, falsified in favor of Christianity?

I dare not occupy further space on this thesis, although I have hardly entered on the subject. You can find, though, if you have any desire to really read the reasons of a Christian's hope, far abler and exhaustive argument on it in Paley and Horne, beside the many later treatises on miracles. But I fear that if you can still deliberately affirm that the performance of miracles by Christ was not mentioned until a century after his death, you will have very little desire to give them an impartial reading. I now turn to your remarks upholding the the third thesis.

You say: "It does not appear that St. Barnabas, bishop of Milan, knew anything of the four canonical gospels; neither did St. Clement, bishop of Rome; neither did St. Hermas, bishop of Philipopolis; neither did St. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna; neither did St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch; neither did Papias, bishop of Hierapolis; neither did Quadratus, bishop of Athens; neither did Aristides of Athens; neither did Hegeseppus; neither did Justin Martyr; neither did Melito, bishop of Sardis."

If by the above you mean that none of them, in any writing now preserved have distinctly stated, like Irenæus has, that there were only four gospels, I will find no fault, for the statement is true although not the whole truth. If you mean that they never have quoted from the four gospels, the assertion is as far from truth as could be penned. I went up to the Astor Library this noon and in a hurried glance at the translations of such of them as are in the "Ante Nicene Library" in less than thirty minutes noticed as many distinct quotations from Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. What are the facts of the case?

Of the writings of the above there have reached our times but the merest fragments; of Papias, particularly, you could almost count the sentences upon your fingers. Now, in view of this fact, how stable a foundation is it for an argument to say that they did not know this or that? Suppose everything of Shakspere's were destroyed except portions of Hamlet, how much honesty would there be in proving from that part that he had never heard of Julius Cæsar? Suppose by some extraordinary vandalism every work of Milton was lost except his "Lycidas" and "Comus," would that prove that he had never known anything of the biblical account of the fall of man or of redemption by Christ? Your argument has no firmer facts to support it, and is not a whit less ridiculous.

In the few portions of the above writers that have been preserved, there is not the slightest reason for their making any reference to the number of gospels or to their writers. Eusebius, however, has preserved Clement's account of the origin of the gospel of Mark, and also the confirmation by Papias of this recital, besides his statement that Matthew composed his gospel in the Hebrew dialect.

Let the reader keep in memory, then, that but very little of the writings of the above have survived let him remember that of what has survived it is utterly foreign to the purpose of the writers to have given a catalogue of the gospels and their writers; and when he finds frequently scattered through them quotations that are now found in our gospels, and the same teachings as are now received by Christians, he will be better competent to judge your remark.

I cannot, however, offer any proof of the genuineness of the gospels in this letter without prolonging it to an utterly unpardonable length. In my next I hope to conclusively prove that the doubts which Infidels attempt to awaken about the genuineness of the books of the New Testament are unsupported by facts. Yours truly, G. M. MAIR.

[From The Seymour Times.]

The Conclusion is that Jefferson's Honor Remains Untarnished.

The Seymour Times does not reach me as early as it reaches Mr. Burr, which explains my failure to reply to his article as quickly as he honors me with his attention. I hav just read his rejoinder in the Times of March 5th. Before receiving this I sent a note explaining my use of an extract alleged to be from Benjamin Franklin. Mr. Burr had replied to an article containing it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and had recognized it as genuin; and knowing he had access to libraries, and being myself where I could not see Franklin's works, it is not strange that I failed to verify it before using it. But I make no attempt to justify my negligence, only to explain it. Mr. Burr says in THE TRUTH SEEKER that he was "misled" by a "blunderer," whom he calls in the Times an "ignoramus." But I was misled by Mr. Burr. However, as "to err is human," I cast no reflections upon him for this mistake.

Mr. Burr refers to "this and other previous exposures of the mistakes of Underwood." "Underwood, the chief of blunderers," as he calls me in another paper that he knows is unfriendly to me, and for which I hav not written a line on this subject, and asks whether he shall "condescend" to reply to my "insinuation" that it is doubtful whether Webster ever said Jefferson "had no reasoning faculty?" Mr. Burr seems for the moment to imagin that a mere statement from him dissenting from my opinions is "an exposure of errors." I will remind him that mere assertion is not refutation, and mere dissent is not argument. If he has made the "exposure" he alludes to, it must hav been in some paper that I do not see.

1. Now I submit that a verbal expression imputed to Webster will hav but little weight among those accustomed to scrutinize testimony; 2. Webster was an opponent of the Jefferson school of politics, and in his time the discussions growing out of the different principles and policies of the Republicans and Federalists were very bitter. Eminent men on both sides did then, as they do now, indulge in personal remarks that were unfair and untrue; 3. Nevertheless, passages can be given from Webster's speeches and writings which show that the expression alluded to does not giv his deliberate estimate of Jefferson; 4. Even if Webster did use the expression, it is contradicted and overwhelmingly refuted by Jefferson's writings, which remain a monument to his learning and statesmanship, and to his power as a profound and comprehensiv thinker and reasoner. He was not only a statesman, but a mathematician of great ability, and was complimented by Webster for his researches in natural history, and recognized in Europe as a man of great arguments and philosophic mind; 5. Even if Jefferson had not been much of a reasoner, it would not follow that he did not write the Declaration, because that is an impassioned statement of wrongs and assertion of rights rather than a philosophical essay or an attempt at profound reasoning.

As for Parker, I stated: 1. That his estimates of men were not always just. This Mr. Burr knows, as in the case of Paine; 2. It has not been shown that Parker denied to Jefferson the qualification necessary to write the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Burr fails to quote a sentence from either Webster or Parker to show they denied or disbelieved Jefferson's authorship.

But Ingersoll is "a competent authority." So Mr. Burr thinks when he can quote a sentence from him to sustain his positions; but one would not think Mr. Burr so regarded him when he was, through some of the papers, recently criticising him severely and accusing him of misconceptions and misrepresentations. Col. Ingersoll is as good an "authority" on Junius as on Jefferson, and he says Paine "was neither a coward, a calumniator, nor a sneak. All these delightful qualities must hav lovingly united in Junius." Mr. Burr will not concur in the justice or correctness of this verdict. He will permit me to attach as little weight to what the eloquent Colonel says about the Declaration.

And notwithstanding the misrepresentations and slanders Mr. Burr has imputed to Prof. Denslow, he is again quoted because, it is alleged, I hav pronounced his essays "conclusiv." But my opinion is that his essays are inconclusiv; and in spite of either a mistake of the printer, or a slip of the pen, if Mr. Burr had considered the whole sentence, together with my known rejection of Denslow's conclusion, he hardly could hav taken advantage of this error in two numbers of the Times before it was possible for me to correct it. An error or a fallacy will sometimes run a long distance while truth is "putting on its boots;" but when the boots are on, and the truth gets started, the error is sure to be overtaken and kicked, if not killed.

Mr. Burr should not class me among his "assailants." I wrote an article to show Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Burr was not mentioned, I think. He saw fit to reply, as he had a right to, and I hav defended my position from his criticisms, as I hav a right to.

I hav given, 1. The repeated statements of Jefferson that he wrote that paper; 2. The testimony of Bancroft, the historian; 3. A statement from the American Cyclopedia; 4. An extract from an address by the learned Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Boston, who declares there is no room for doubt on the subject; 5. The opinion of James Parton, who says, "There is not the smallest reason to doubt that Mr. Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence." There is other proof; but unless Mr. Burr does better than he has in disposing of what I hav presented I shall be in no hurry to bring it forward.

1. Mr. Burr has given his own opinion, many times repeated, that Jefferson did not write the Declaration; 2. He has quoted Webster and Parker, but not one word to the effect that Jefferson did not write the paper; 3. He has referred to Ingersoll and Denslow, after having repudiated their opinions, and convicted them, as he thinks, of grave errors of statement and judgment on other subjects.

I hav written this simply to point out the weakness of what Mr. Burr would hav us regard as valid objections to the conviction that Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence.

Jefferson's honor remains untarnished, and in spite of Mr. Burr's efforts to belittle him, we may continue to call him the "Sage of Monticello." Bring forward the remainder of your objections, Mr. Burr.

"'Twas for your pleasure you came here;
You shall go back for mine."

Yours respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

MIRACLES.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I have yielded to you several times already in our discussion, and will not now contend with you with respect to my definition of miracles, though I cannot see why it is not strictly correct. Perhaps I, who do not believe that a miracle ever took place, should hardly undertake to describe what it is. I fail, however, to see the "sophism" in the latter part of my definition which meets your disapprobation, and that is that miracles are "contrary to the experience of mankind." That is not a sophism; it is a truism. An event in keeping with the experience of mankind would be a common occurrence, an every-day affair, and no miracle. But to undertake to prove miracles a reality because people have believed in them is sophistry or false reasoning of the worst kind. That kind of sophistry, if permitted, would prove the existence of fairies, sprites, witches, genii, gnomes, hobgoblins, dragons, griffins, gods, demi-gods, devils, and all the rest of the fancied existences. They have all been strongly believed in when men's minds were darkened by gross superstition, but I defy you to prove that one of them has a real existence. If you have one anywhere please trot him out so we can all see him. But until you can produce one, or till you can prove that he exists, do not ask me to believe in them.

The authority whom you quote, Dr. McCosh, disagrees with your idea of a miracle, and substantially coincides with me—"a supernatural interposition." A supernatural interposition is above nature and opposed to it. So Dr. McCosh and myself are right, and you are wrong. Until you can point to one event contrary to the laws of nature that really occurred, you should not advocate miracles.

Your attempt to claim as miracles the operations of nature in the formation of rocks on the surface of the earth is a failure. If rocks were created from nothing six thousand years ago by a supernatural being, it was miracle; but if they were evolved from a preëxisting fluid or gaseous state, and deposited, crystallized, and solidified, it was no miracle, but a simple operation of nature in obedience to nature's laws. Science fully demonstrates that the rocks were not suddenly created six thousand years ago, but that the process of rock formation on the surface of the earth has been going on for millions of years. Science proves that geology is true and that the Bible is false.

Your assertion that chemical analysis demonstrates the intervention of deity I must pronounce the merest bosh. There is not the slightest proof in nature that a supernatural being or power ever interveued or interfered. Natural forces have been sufficient to cause every event that has ever taken place. It was once thought that the sun could not rise in the morning and make its daily course without a god to perform the feat; that Phœbus, or Apollo, drove him forth like a courser every morning and through the day, and took him back by an underground passage at night to the place of starting. But now we understand that the earth is a sphere, and by the forces of light, electricity, etc., revolves regularly every twenty-four hours, which causes the appearance of the rising and setting of the sun, and that it requires no god to drive it forth and guide it in its course. Man in his primitive, ignorant state invested nearly every natural phenomenon with gods, and regarded every occurrence as a miracle, but as we become more enlightened and better informed we see the utter absurdity of all that and become convinced that everything takes place in obedience to natural laws, and that the services of no Hindoo, Chinese, Egyptian, Grecian, Roman, or Jewish god is required to cause nature to act. Nature is a million times more powerful and more perfect than all the gods which ignorant men have devised.

You evince the disposition to lug in a god to do something where you do not understand nature's powers and possibilities, the same as ignorant men did in olden times and the same as ignorant men do still among the savage tribes; hence you talk about "the omnipotent fiat of deity" in the production of life. If you could only understand that nature has been equal to every result that has taken place, and has produced it, you would no longer have any use for gods and devils, and would cease to imagine them or contemplate them. Nature possesses all the powers and potencies which have an existence. Nature had no inventor or creator, and needs no superintendent or governor. Yes, in the smallest atom of its existence there is more reality, more power, than is possessed by all the gods which men have devised, including Brahma, Ormuzd, Changti, Baal, Osiris, Chemosh, Moloch, Moldah, Jove, Jah, Odin, Mumbo Jumbo, and all the others of the nine hundred and ninety-nine impossible nonentities.

Your assertion that "the universal testimony of men is that miracles are necessary to prove a revelation from God" falls far short of proving the existence of miracles, as the so-called miracles fall far short of proving a revelation from God. It far stronger proves the existence of ignorance and superstition in the minds of men. Confucius was unquestionably one of the greatest teachers the world has known, and he made no claim to miracles, nor did he recognize the supernatural. If the subject were not so serious it would be amusing to see so-called miracles trying to sustain a so-called revelation from God, and the so-called revelation trying to sustain miracles. But the attempt is futile. It is the blind leading the blind, and both must fall in the ditch together. The fall is well deserved; whatever attempts to set itself above the axioms of reason and the truths of nature deserves thus to fall.

Your effort to show a marked distinction between the miracles ascribed to Jesus in the canonical gospels and those in the apocryphal gospels, as well as the miracles ascribed to Christna, Buddha, Apollonius, Simon Magus, and numerous others who hav pretended to perform miracles is not a success. It requires a person of tolerably active imagination to see much difference in the manner in which the so-called miracles are narrated. I must confess that I am unable to see any superiority in the style of the canonical gospels over the other miracle stories; they are about of a piece. The statements that Jesus made birds of clay, causing them to fly, and that he stretched out lumber to any desired length when his reputed father made blunders in his measurements, are equally as well given, and just as probable as his feeding five thousand people with seven loaves and two fishes, converting water into wine, and raising from the dead a body that had passed into the state of decomposition. A believer may be able to see a wide difference between these several big stories; but, if so, it must be with the eye of faith. An unbeliever can see no difference. The mud-bird story and the wash-water story prove revelation just as strongly as does the fishy picnic dinner story, the water-wine, or the bad smell from a decomposing body. They are all of a piece, not as beautiful as the stories of the Arabian Nights, but perhaps equally as worthy of belief.

If the stories of the miracles performed by Jesus were devised for the purpose of convincing the world that he was a God, a superior natural being, it is a great pity that they should be of so weak a character, and so like what you consider as unreliable and untruthful, that a man of ordinary intelligence cannot discriminate between them. If Jesus possessed divine power, if he performed miracles, and if it is of any consequence that the world should believe them, it is greatly to be regretted that their character is so similar to those of bogus pretenders and that their narration is not sensibly superior.

It is perfectly easy for you to see that the miracles of all others except Jesus, whether before or since, are false and pretentious, while you imagine that those pertaining to him are the simon-pure, genuine article. This can easily be accounted for, because you are a warm partisan of Jesus and readily believe everything that is claimed for him. It is precisely the same with the partisans of Christna, Buddha, Apollonius, Mohammed, and all the pretentious religious founders who have lived. But I occupy impartial ground, and look upon all these characters in much the same light, and cannot see very much difference between them. I see no more "moral dignity and grandeur" connected with the so-called miracles of Jesus than with the same of Christna, Buddha, Zoroaster, Apollonius, and all the rest. I regard the claims to miracle-working equally false with all—all equally full of "grotesque nonsense and ridiculous stories."

You claim that the heathen miracles were not related with the same laudable purpose as were the Jesus miracles, but I am not able to see this as plainly as you do. The heathen miracles were told to increase the faith and veneration of the hearers for the persons who were said to perform them, and it was no less the same with Christian miracles—their object was to increase faith in Jesus.

You endeavor to make a point by saying that "the miracles of Christ were published among those among whom he was alleged to have performed them, who were living in his time." But this argument has no force. Buddha, Apollonius, and Mohammed are far more historical than Jesus. It is well known that they lived, but there is no proof that Jesus did. Had he lived and performed the wonderful deeds that you would have me believe, Josephus, who came on the stage immediately after, would have said something of him. The fact that he did not, nor any other historian either, is proof positive that such a person had no real existence. Your claim that thousands of Christians a century or more after the time of Jesus believed in his existence and his miracles proves nothing. Every principal religious zealot and myth has had a similar following. But blind faith does not make an impossibility possible.

Your most important argument in favor of the miracles of Jesus, the ancient prophecies, seems particularly weak. If Christian miracles have nothing better to sustain them their fate is hopeless indeed. The prophecies and miracles are made to play a reciprocal game—prophecies are adduced to prove miracles, and miracles, with an equally happy facility, are made to prove prophecy. I could hardly repress a smile when reading your extended quotations from the vague, unmeaning utterances of the old itinerant Jewish priests called prophets. If you have no better proofs to offer, your case is weak indeed. Taken as a class, they are so indefinite and vague that they apply to one person as well as to another. The original word rendered prophecy was singing or playing on musical instruments, as was the case with Saul when he went after his father's asses. He fell in with the prophets and prophesied with them, but he undertook to foretell no future events. There have been many musicians in the world who, like Saul, have "prophesied" by singing and playing, but like him were wholly unable to foretell future events. Many gypsies, astrologers, soothsayers, pagan oracles, and fortune-tellers, have lived in all ages, and have made pretensions to foretelling events; and I am not prepared to say they hav not succeeded just as well as the Jewish prophets did in describing what was to take place centuries after. Their predictions are so vague and indefinite that they will apply to one case as well as another, and will hit equally well, however the event may take place. We have prophets even in our own time who foretell the weather and predict storms with considerable accuracy several days ahead. The almanac makers predict the weather even a year ahead, and I am inclined to think they are quite as successful in their predictions as were the Jewish prophets. The great characteristic of the latter is that they are dark, obscure, uncertain, and vague as were the oracles of Apollo and Diana. Not one prophecy in twenty can be directed to any specific event, nor be proved to have been fulfilled. Almost every shrewd person ought to be able to predict certain coming events and partially speak truly one time in twenty without being aided by infinite power.

Among the many who have predicted coming events, and who laid no claim to divine aid, are Lactantius, St. Cesaire, Virgil, Seneca, Dr. Johnson, Napoleon, Lord Chesterfield, the Cornish prophesiers who predicted the destruction of St. Paul's church, Penzance, and New Lynn, as recorded by Polewell in his history of Cornwall, and Sir John Davis in his discoveries in relation to the subversion of Ireland. Predictors or prophesiers have lived in all ages and have predicted upon all subjects. Some have made wild shots and some good hits. Our own country has not been without its prophets, but I will not stop now to look them all up or enumerate them; even at this hour our land is full of predictors of the evil that is soon to befall us. Prophecy is at best little more than guess-work, and the Yankee nation are called good guessers. In this connection I will venture this assertion: If all the prophecies that have been made without any claim to assistance from on high, if all the predictions that have been made by others than Jewish prophets, were collected, they would excel in quantity ten times over the Hebrew article, and many of them ten times as accurate.

Prophecy has by no means been peculiar to the Jews. It was indulged in long before they were a nation. Hindoo, Persian, and Egyptian prophets were before the Jewish. As to correctness, the pagans are by no means inferior. Col. Wilkes, in his "Hindoo Sketches," relates a Hindoo prophecy which was singularly fulfilled in the person of Sevajee, the conqueror and deliverer of his people. Similar cases may be cited of nearly all nationalities. The prophecy of St. Cesaire was in reference to the French Revolution and was more definite than any contained in the Bible. It is in French, and is in a book, Liber Mirabilis, p. 542, and has been verified in the king's library, Paris, where the original is found. It is too lengthy to quote, but the fulfilment was more complete and literal than anything of the kind found in the Bible, and is claimed to have been made twelve hundred years before it was fulfilled.

These characteristics of Bible prophecies have been pointed out: 1. Many of them were not written until after events prophesied had occurred; 2. Their vague and indefinite character; 3. The lack of fulfilment on the part of a large portion of those which may be called clear; 4. The severe manner in which the prophets denounced those they termed false, much as our patent-medicine venders denounce all nostrums save their own remarkable potions, powders, or pills.

I will take the time to very briefly examine the quotations you make from the Jewish prophets to prove the miracles of Jesus, and which you regard as irrefragable proofs:

1. You quote from Genesis about the scepter not departing from Judah until Shiloh came. The prediction is most vague; no intimation is given as to what kind of a person Shiloh was to be, or how to come. There is no proof that Christ was the person hinted at, and he was never called Shiloh. If Christ was the person meant, the prophecy was a false one, for the scepter did depart from Judah before he came. The Jews were several times subdued by their enemies, and were seventy years (so said) in captivity at one time, in Babylon; when they returned, the scepter was not restored to Judah, and before Jesus was born the Jews were under the power of the Romans. The scepter had departed. Thus this so-called prophecy does not truly apply to Jesus, and nobody can tell with any certainty whom it does apply to.

2. The passage from the wild, indefinite language of Isaiah about a voice in the wilderness can apply to Jesus only by forced construction. He did not cry in the wilderness, nor make straight paths in the desert. The language applies to a thousand other persons just as well as to Jesus.

3. If Micah meant Jesus in the passage you quote from him, he certainly prophesied falsely, for Jesus never was "a ruler in Israel." He was only a mere tramp, if the story told of him is true.

4. The passage which you quote from Psalms about establishing the seed of David forever is assuredly false, for that seed was not established forever, and the language had no reference to Jesus whatever. The weakness of your case is made clear by such puerile efforts at prophecy.

5. The quotation from the wild, poetical language of Isaiah about a child having been born, etc., is not a prophecy at all. It does not predict what was to come, but speaks of something that had already taken place, and refers far more closely to Cyrus than Jesus. The government was not at any time upon the shoulders of Jesus, nor was he called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, nor the Everlasting Father.

6. Your next quotation from Isaiah about beautiful feet upon the mountains has no more application to Jesus than to any number of other persons. Nothing is said about his having beautiful feet, nor did he bring peace or publish it. He said himself that he came not to bring peace, but the sword. His people after his time were soon completely crushed by war, and his followers have been noted for war, cruelty, and bloodshed; anything but peacefulness.

7. The next passage from the same vague and weird prophet has no more allusion to Jesus than to Brigham Young. It is even not a prophecy, but alludes to things in existence when the language was uttered. The writer was evidently talking about himself.

8. The next obscure quotation is equally unmeaning. It is only an active imagination, combined with a desire to find allusions to Jesus, that can make this apply to your miracle-worker.

9. The next about being "a stone of stumbling, a rock of offense, a gin, and a snare," is equally blind, and it is the sheerest absurdity to say that the language means Jesus any more than the Khan of Tartary.

10. The next long quotation applies no more to Jesus than to a thousand others, and is not a prophecy, but relates to something that had taken place, and to somebody who had already lived. If it meant Jesus it is incorrect, for he was not put in prison and he did open his mouth. The language, "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter and as a sheep before his shearers," will apply to any one who is brought into court and sentenced or fined. I was thus treated and was not allowed to open my mouth when I wished to say why I should not be sent to prison. Still I do not think Isaiah had the slightest allusion to me, but just as much as to Jesus.

11. The incoherent quotation from Psalms about the bulls of Bashan bears no truthful relation to Jesus. He was not poured out like water, his bones were not out of joint, nor was his heart of wax which melted in the midst of his bowels. The language is no prophecy at best; it predicts nothing, and does not allude to the future nor say what should come to pass. Whoever the writer was, nobody knows (though it is pretty sure it was not David); but he was making a bitter complaint about something that had taken place; and the allusion to pierced hands and feet, and the parting of garments, was mere poetical language that will apply equally well to all who have seen trouble and affliction.

12. The next quotation from Isaiah is another vague and obscure allusion to somebody who had lived. It is not even in the language of prophecy, and, even if it were, it would apply to scores of persons just as well as to Jesus.

13. You must indeed be hard up for proofs to drag in Micah's enigmatical talk about a judge in Israel being smitten with a rod on the cheek. Jesus was not a judge in Israel, and was not smitten on the cheek with a rod.

14. The next from Isaiah bears no possible allusion to Jesus. The cities of his land were not wasted when he came; they were not left without an inhabitant, nor was the land "utterly desolate." I defy any one to tell truthfully who or what Isaiah was talking about. He did not know himself.

15. The quotation from Zechariah is of much the same character. It does not allude to Jesus. If the Lord sought to destroy all the nations which came against Jerusalem he most signally fai ed in his undertakings, for it was the Jews which were destroyed, and the Romans were victorious, and remained so hundreds of years after.

16. Your last quotation from Iasiah is of the same vague, incoherent character that will apply to one person as well as another, and it is only by a stretch of language that it can be made to fit the case of Jesus. A great portion of the language of the prophets was of this style, meaning much or meaning little, meaning one person or another, just as you choose to apply it.

Thus your sixteen quotations, probably the best you could select, which you would have me believe pointed out the coming son of God are briefly examined, and I do not find one among them which I candidly think could have referred to Jesus. That this was practically the case and that these so-called prophecies did not intelligently point out the coming messiah, prince, or ruler is conclusively proved by the fact that when Jesus came no one recognized him by anything the prophets had said. If, for a moment, it is conceded that they pointed to him, it was utterly useless, for none were aided by the prophecies, not one knew when they were fulfilled. If it was the purpose of God, by those prophecies, to prepare the world for the reception of his Son, he signally failed in his enterprise, for no one knew his Son when he came by the descriptions which the prophets had given. It was all labor lost.

Yes, I am free to say I do not believe that one of the passages which you quote have the slightest reference to Jesus, or that one of the old prophets, so called, ever thought of him when they were speaking or writing what they did. I regard it as a barefaced imposition to undertake to coerce the world into accepting those almost unmeaning remarks as having allusion to the Prince of Heaven, who was to appear on earth hundreds of years after the words were spoken. If God really wished the world to know that his Son was to pay a thirty years' visit to the earth, and if he wanted mankind to know what kind of a person he was to be, I would be glad to know why he did not express himself so he could be understood by at least one person in a thousand? It seems to me, also, that your proofs of the reality of miracles by these ambiguous quotations are extremely weak, and it is most unfortunate for you and your cause that it has so slender and unstable a foundation to stand upon. So far from those passages reading like a history of the events in the life of Jesus, they do not make the slightest reference to them; they will apply to hundreds of other persons just as well as to the Carpenter's Son.

Your attempt to adduce the Talmud as proof that Jesus lived as represented is not a success, for, upon the assurance of an intelligent Hebrew, I have to state that it makes no reference to him.

Your glowing language about the miracles said to have been performed by the early Christians has but small weight with me, as the account of them is so very apocryphal. If those miracles were really performed, I must insist that somebody ought to have known it beside the unknown writers who cooked up those narratives. If such wonders were performed, Josephus and his companions, who detailed all marvelous and conspicuous events, should have known and said something about them. The fact that they maintain absolute silence on the subject is conclusive that they and others knew nothing about them. It is far more probable that those miracle stories were concocted a century or two afterward than that they occurred, and that nobody but the Christians knew aught of it. The principal account of the miracles performed by the apostles and others is found in the book of Acts; and from all the accounts at hand, it was not written till well along in the second century. It certainly was not written by any of the apostles themselves, and nobody knows who did write it. Renan styles it "The Christian Odyssey," evidently regarding it as a fiction; and the Rev. J. W. Chadwick terms it a "charming fiction." It abounds in the speeches of Peter, Paul, and Stephen; but a peculiarity about them is that they are all alike—a representation devoid of truth. It contradicts other portions of the New Testament in many important particulars, both the gospels and Paul's epistles. If they are true, Acts is assuredly false.

I can now give but an instance or two of these positive contradictions. The gospels say Judas hung himself. Acts says he fell headlong, burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. Luke puts the ascension of Jesus on the same day with the resurrection, while Acts has it forty days after. Luke says at Bethany; Acts, at the Mount of Olives. One of these assuredly is false, and probably both. There are at least twenty other positive contradictions between Acts and the other books which I will not take the space to print. If, however, you want them, I will give them to you at another time. One thing is most certain: the book of Acts is most unreliable authority for such monstrous stories as that Peter and Paul raised men from the dead, and other almost equally remarkable feats. A person who can drink down such absurd statements and believe them true deserves no better mental pabulum than Gulliver's travels and Baron Munchausen's tales.

The Rev. Mr. Chadwick is quite justified in denominating it a "theological romance—a romance with a set purpose" to falsely compromise the antagonism between the partisans of Peter and Paul. "What shall we say," asks he, "of this double transformation? First, that if Paul was such a man as he is represented in the book of Acts, he is but little worthy of our admiration, leaving the apostles out of account; but, second, taking the epistles into the account, that either Acts misrepresents him grossly, or he was not only a liar and a hypocrite, but a blustering Falstaff, bragging of heroisms of which he was incapable, and slandering men who were of larger mold and better spirit than himself. Choose, as you must, one or the other of these two alternatives."

This book is the authority upon which you ask me to believe that two men raised two other men from the dead and did other similar miracles. I answer you I cannot do anything of the kind. I simply do not believe one word of such absurdities.

With regard to miracles I am inclined to think that the Christian Father, St. Chryostom, had a far more correct view of the worth and use of them than yourself and many other ardent Christians. He declared that "miracles are proper only to excite sluggish and vulgar minds; that men of sense have no occasion for them, and that they frequently carry some outward suspicion along with them." He states it very mildly; there is always a very strong suspicion connected with the account of all miracles; none of them are true. A man of a really sound mind has hardly any business to believe in a miracle by anybody. They are simply gotten up by ignoramuses, or by the designing to wheedle and stimulate those of "sluggish, vulgar minds." It is easy to conceive that that was the class to whom the miracle stories were early told. Mosheim, in his "Ecclesiastical History," speaking of the pretended miracles wrought in the early Christian centuries, says, "The simplicity and ignorance of the generality in those times furnished the most favorable occasions for the exercise of fraud; and the impudence of impostors in contriving false miracles was artfully proportioned to the credulity of the vulgar, while the wise, who by their sagacity perceived these cheats, were overawed into silence by the dangers that threatened their lives and fortunes if they should expose the artifice." The learned Christian, Dr. Middleton, in his famous "Free Inquiry," when quoting the authority of St. Cyprian as to the frauds of the early centuries, observes, "From all these considerations, taken together, it must, I think, be allowed, that the forged miracles of the fourth century give us just reasons to suspect the pretensions of every other age both before and after it." Well would it be if all Christians could entertain views as sensible. They would then understand that it is vastly easier to assert that a miracle has been performed than to perform one, and when they saw it stated that miracles had been performed they would doubt it stubbornly until they had positive proof in the affirmative. They would take the assertions of no unknown persons as proof. It is sure that the New Testament contains many inaccuracies and misstatements, and it is impossible for it to make falsehood a truth more than anybody else's say so. All claims of miracles should be totally discarded.

If there is a God of infinite wisdom and power, to change the eternal course of his government and stoop to the performance of a miracle proves him weak and vacillating. If he possesses infinite wisdom he knew at first how to order the operations of the universe; and if he afterward finds it necessary to change that order and cause events in opposition to his established laws, it shows him to be changeable and fickle. If he thought at first that he knew the best system by which everything can work, and afterward concluded to try some other way, it argues that he was mistaken at the outset, or that he does not adhere to one purpose. Instead of miracles proving an infinitely wise, powerful, and unchangeable God, they prove the opposite. If, infinitely good and wise, he established his domain to be governed by the best possible code of laws, to change them at all must be for the worse. He could not, consistently with immutable principles of omniscience and omnipotence, be a miracle-worker. It is better to believe in no God at all than in one changeable, weak-minded, and fickle. To admit that any being less than an almighty God could subvert the laws of nature and produce results unlike what would otherwise taken place is simply preposterous—the hight of absurdity.

I will here repeat the truth that neither of the apostolic Fathers makes any mention of the miracles of Jesus, nor do they refer to any of the circumstances connected with his alleged material resurrection. Ignatius (A.D. 115) was the first to allude, in a blind, mysterious way, to the immaculate conception. No mention is made to either of the four gospels, nor to the book of Acts till by Irenæus, in the year 170. If you are able to disprove the truth of this I wish you to do so.—Continued on p. 220.

My Trip East.

BY W. F. JAMIESON.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I landed in New York Sunday morning, Dec. 19, 1880. During the day I traveled many miles on New York's elevated railroad, an institution that is the perfection of railroad travel. One glides along over the heads of the people and vehicles with a feeling of tranquillity which is itself a luxury, begotten of the consciousness that if the neat little train which slips along so easily and swiftly should run off the track, there are stout timbers on each side, as well as the ties underneath, which make assurance doubly sure. The tracks are also double, on which account a collision is as likely as an angel visit to a Materialist. Every railroad in the land ought to hav those stout double timbers laid all along the iron rails, like the elevated railway. Then if Edison will apply electricity, we can afford to slide along gently at the rate of 120 miles an hour. Oh, it has got to come!

Now in New York the elevated railway is reduced to a system as exact as clock-work. The stations are placed at intervals of from six to ten streets apart. You mount a covered flight of stairs and enter a pretty little depot, or station, put down a dime at the ticket office, take the printed slip, drop it into a glass receiver as you pass out on the platform; the puffing locomotiv soon comes along, either forward or backward, with its train of two, three, or four coaches. "All aboard!" swings open the iron gate on the coach platform; passengers get off and on the train with celerity; away rushes the model. "Eighth street!" cries the conductor, quickly followed by "Fourteenth street," "Twenty-third street," and "Thirty-fourth street," leaving the slow-going, toiling horses underneath to trot wearily along. Everything is speedily left behind, no matter which way it may be going.

Every time I see the metropolis it appears greater—it is greater. It is a restless, growing giant. Throngs of people can be seen in many of its streets long after midnight. What a busy, nervous existence its inhabitants liv! Here the extremes meet—wealth and poverty, elegance and squalor, cleanliness and filth, refinement and brutality, vice and virtue, self-sacrifice and selfishness; toiling, moiling, broiling; a foaming, fuming mass of humanity.

I make no attempt to describe New York. That would require too many quires of paper and too many bottles of ink; and, back of them all, familiarity with the subject and genius for the descriptiv work. So I merely giv hints.

Sunday evening I went to Cartier Hall to hear my opponent, Moses Hull, lecture on the "Philosophy of Superstition." The hall is small and cozy as a parlor, and was well filled. By invitation of Moses, I "spake a few words unto the people." Mr. Hull had spoken there for months to good acceptance, making many friends. He has a very easy delivery, and an enthusiasm in his subject that rarely fails to awaken enthusiasm in his hearers.

D. M. BENNETT.

Eugene Macdonald (vice-president) may take the chair, as the famous truth seeker might not entertain the motion. On Monday morning, Dec. 20th, I first set eyes upon this plain, matter-of-fact man. As I entered his office he waited for no introduction. "Ah," said he, "this is brother Jamieson. I know you from your photograph." We were soon in chat. A huge pile of letters lay before him, just received from the post-office, and a heap of money orders. I thought, And this is the way the jealous editors are killing off Bennett! According to my philosophy, there is room enough in the world for all there is in it. There are not so many Liberal papers, nor Liberal lecturers, that they need crowd one another. I wish there were a hundredfold more.

Friend Bennett is a steady-going worker, good-natured, calm in business; collected, I should judge, in almost any exigency. Did all the gods of antiquity break loose at once with a shower of thunderbolts upon his head, he would likely look over his shoulder, and in his ordinary tone inquire, "What's the matter now?" Nothing seems to disturb him, or, what is better, he does not allow Adam nature to show itself. Notwithstanding the vast amount of work he does, he never seems in a hurry. I think at times he may be a little fretful, judging from the nervo in his temperament, but if he is, it does not last long.

In his sanctum he is as unpretending as a farmer holding his plow. He does not need to affect to be one of the people; he is one of them. His office is plainness itself; small enough at best, but made still smaller by books and pamphlets piled all around the room to the ceiling. Imagin a family dry-goods box lined with books, papers, pamphlets. Peep down into it, and there sits that indefatigable editor and publisher, with a large case of books in front of him jutting out half way across the room, on the other side of which is his solitary clerk, filling orders for books and performing other general work belonging to a publisher's office.

LONG ISLAND SOUND.

It seems odd to embark on a trip by water in spite of zero and King Winter. Think of a splendid steamer, a veritable floating palace—the Newport—comfortably warmed and lighted, plowing her way through a sea of broken ice from New York to Fall River, Mass. The boat leaves the pier from New York daily at 4:30 P.M., and arrives in Fall River at 5 A.M. The fare is but two dollars to Boston, including the ride by cars from Fall River to Boston. A stateroom on the boat costs one dollar. Cheap traveling and gorgeous accommodations are thus afforded by the Old Colony company. There is another line, the Stonington, which is said to be an excellent route also.

A ride by moonlight on one of these beautiful steamers is the perfection of modern travel. The comfort of the passengers seems to be the supreme thought of the management. In summer there is the addition of a band of music to enliven the sail.

BOSTON.

I visited the Hub to make arrangements, if possible, to hold a debate with Hull. I called upon those stanch veterans of Freethought, Mr. J. P. Mendum, who is nearly always present at his post on the ground floor of the clean-looking Paine building, and Mr. Horace Seaver, up toward heavenly mansions, in the fifth story. Busy as he was at his desk, he found time for a few minutes' chat. With busy men I always make my interviews short—as short and to the point as the Investigator editor wishes his correspondents to be. I found time to talk with both men about the Liberal movement in the West, and the brightening Freethought outlook.

W. S. Bell and Dr. Moran had the use of the hall for fox hunting—beg pardon! God seeking. The Paine building is in good demand for lectures, parties, debates, and concerts, consequently we could not obtain it for five nights in succession.

I called upon Laura Kendrick, one of the most eloquent lecturers of modern times, a humanitarian by instinct, and practically a worker for the benefit of her fellow-mortals. She never hesitated to express an unpopular truth, and, like others who march in the front ranks of battle, she has suffered for her bravery. Misrepresentations and falsehoods she has endured that some tabooed principle might triumph through her sacrifice. I am in hopes that this gifted lady will ere long occupy the platforms of lecture societies. At present she is partially secluded, busied with the education of her daughter. Occasionally she visits towns near Boston, and wherever she speaks givs unbounded satisfaction, as the people of Boston, Orange, Harwick, Lynn, and many other places can testify. I hope she will be called often. Her address is No. 34 Hanson street, Boston, Mass.

Mr. Kendrick is an affable, cultured gentleman, and shares with Laura her Liberal, reformatory views. I passed an evening with them and joined them in tea. I called at the Banner of Light establishment and had a few minutes' conversation with Mr. Dudley and his two fellow-clerks. Mr. Colby was not in the office that day.

BACK TO NEW YORK VIA SOUND STEAMER.

Monday evening, Jan. 3d, I began the long-talked-of debate with my godson Moses, in Republican Hall, before an audience tolerable in size. The interest in the discussion grew from the beginning to the last word. It is the intention to print the debate in full, with an account of all the experiments of subsequent debates and the failure of the Spiritualists to come forward with theirs, although I repeatedly challenged my opponent to bring them then and there, for mediums are numerous in New York city, and some of them are said to giv startling manifestations before the public. A slate was exhibited by Mr Hull on which there was writing by Slade, but Mr. Slade himself was conspicuous by his absence. His partner, Mr. Simmons, was present. Mrs. Mattie Hull improvised a pretty little poem upon the "Summer Land." Knowing the ability of Mattie to improvise, even in the style of Poe, I giv her the credit, notwithstanding she believes she is inspired by spirits. The subject, it is true, I furnished. As for Poe's promis to be there, I would need to know all the circumstances before I could obtain the glimmer of a test.

Moses quoted largely of the power of spirits to move physical objects. I balanced a lath on the small end of an insulated egg, and coaxed all the mediums and all the spirits to move the delicately-balanced stick a hair's breadth without touching it, or employing such physical means as those used by the scientist. Of course it remained as silent as the grave. Next evening with an electrized glass tube I moved it round and round without physical contact.

There are many experiments which I intend to giv if our discussing continues. My aim is to make debating a distinct profession, as honorable as the legal and far more useful than evangelism. There still lingers in the popular mind the prejudice against people being friends in their differences of opinion. It is still imagined that human beings ought not to treat each other politely if their views about the affairs of this world, and especially concerning the existence of another, are divergent. It is supposed that two persons who are on terms of friendship must express themselvs about each other's errors tenderly, or the silken cord will be snapped in twain. A friendship which is founded on the unanimity of opinion is a superficial, silver-plated thing.

If possible I will do what I can toward breaking down this remnant of barbarism—that controversy means a bitter wordy war or a tirade of vulgar personal abuse or a stupendous effort to gain the mastery over an opponent. The aim of debate should be to elicit truth by the agitation of thought. This principle pervades society to a greater extent than many imagin.

I hope that in this spirit Mr. Hull and I will conduct all our discussions. For my own part I am ready to debate any of the problems with which I hav familiarity. The Spiritualists think they hav solved the question of future existence, while I think they are as much in the dark as any of us. It is not because I hav the least prejudice that I maintain that it will pass away like many other bubbles.

The wrath of so many Spiritualists, so illy concealed in spite of all effort to suppress it, is simply amusing. Why should any of them be angry with me without a cause? I hav followed most faithfully my convictions of truth. The Spiritualists ought to giv me credit for this; but I now know that to expect such a fair estimate of one's motivs is more than their history will warrant. I once believed that Spiritualists could not be sectarian nor bigoted, but I cannot see as they are superior in this respect to the hard-headed Materialists and creed-loving Christians, so universally charged with these unlovely traits. Twenty years ago the boast of the Spiritualistic press was "free speech," "supreme love of truth," and an exhortation everywhere among them to "follow your own highest convictions, wherever they may lead." Let any one practice those Liberal principles, and arrive at conclusions diverse from their own, and curses long and loud are heard issuing from Spiritual lips. The anathemas of the pope are scarcely more virulent.

TO BE CONTINUED.

Fair Play.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The reply of Thomas Huxley to the English bishop, who asked him how he liked the idea of springing from an ape, was excellent, and every honest lover of the truth will coincide with the scientist. Mr. Huxley said, "The revererend gentleman fails entirely to understand the position of the men of science; with them it is not a question of like or dislike, but a question of fact."

It is presumable that differences of opinion arise from three causes—lack of opportunity, indifference regarding investigation, and fear of unsettling present opinions.

There are at the present time two aggressiv schools of radical thought, which I deem equally honest in their efforts to obtain the largest measure of truth.

The Spiritualist and Materialist are one in sincerity, and seek the highest well-being and culture of the "genus homo."

I feel confident that the school to whose principles I adhere are as courageous a class of Freethinkers as the world ever knew. We are constant readers and supporters of The Truth Seeker. We welcome the Materialists to our homes, and do not purpose following the leadership of Cephas B. Lynn and return to church ownership to be fleeced and led by orthodox dignitaries like lambs to the theological slaughter-pen.

If we do not see as clearly as Materialists do, will they not bear patiently with us? And just remember that men like Paine, Voltaire, and Volney, whom they and we love and respect, were quite superstitious in some respects, though many years in advance of the age in which they lived. Thomas Paine "believed in one God and hoped for immortality beyond this life." He also believed that nothing but gold and silver was honest money. Voltaire said, "If there were no God, men would hav to invent one." Volney spoke and wrote of the "All-wise," and "Supreme Agent." Bacon, the father of the inductiv method, said, "A little philosophy inclineth a man's mind to Atheism, while a great deal bringeth him back to religion." We are assured now that these men, these great intellectual men, were mistaken, and that they had not outgrown their superstitious environments.

Atheism, from its exalted scientific position, tells us that all gods, or the idea of an infinit ruler or intelligence controling the universe, are myths—simple creations of the brain under superstitious influences, and that mind is the result of chemical combinations and organization of matter, and cannot exist until matter works out all the conditions for its generation and sustenance. One of the earnest disciples of this school under the head of "Musings of a Kalamazoo Skeptic," lets us know just where he stands, why he thus standeth, and his reasons why he cannot be a Spiritualist.

James S. Bedell's communication is pleasant reading, and his reasons amusing. We hav the temerity, however, to think his reasons very weak, for if spirits would do as he devises, our control here would be useless. He would hav them do the most absurd things, the doing of which, to follow his logic to its ultimate, would leave us little less than nonentities. His sweeping assertion that the Spiritualists, though a pretty fair sort of people, are the subjects of mental hallucination and deserve his pity is, to say the least, in bad taste. He tells us that he stands with Prof. Jamieson, who believes Spiritualism to be one of the greatest humbugs of the age, that will disappear as soon as its "true inwardness" is found out.

One of two things is true; either Prof. Jamieson said so, or he did not. If he did, it stamps him as one of the most dishonest men of the age, for in his position for the long years he professed to be a believer and teacher of this system, when he was admitted to our homes and confidence, he must hav known long before he donned the garb of Materialism that it and himself were frauds. If he did not say it, Jas. S. Bedell has libeled the professor, besides doing injustice to others by his assertions and intimations regarding a "true inwardness," that would lead many to believe that Spiritualism is a concocted scheme of villainy on the part of the leaders who control the movement. Were I guilty of such gross injustice to my Materialistic friends, my article should be headed, "The Ravings and Moanings of a Dyspeptic."

It is true that such minds but echo the treatment that the spiritual phenomena has received at the hands of many of the savans of science. Faraday could talk learnedly of "unconscious muscular action," and yet he was made to appear ridiculous when material bodies were moved without human contact, or machinery. Huxley and Tyndall hav no time. Carpenter acknowledges that the phenomena present evidence worthy scientific research, and then with the coolest assurance (very much like impudence) relegates all the effects to "unconscious cerebration." Mr. Allen Pringle makes no point by telling us we need not feel elated because a few scientists hav espoused our cause; for the same he says is true of others who cling to orthodoxy. There is this difference, Mr. Pringle, you cannot find a single scientist that has given this subject a long and patient investigation that was not more of a Spiritualist than when he commenced, if not fully convinced of all its claims. It is sadly true that men of science, as a rule, hav placed themselvs in opposition to its claims, without any true knowledge concerning the phenomena; and hav been as ready to pooh-pooh, ridicule, and misrepresent as the church has been.

Their treatment of Prof. Hare, a lifelong Materialist, and others, stands against them to their lasting shame.

Let no Materialist imagin for one moment that we shun investigation. We court it, and there is no path of thought that leads to the betterment of human nature that we will not follow as bravely and earnestly as the most radical. We are after the truth, and will do our best to find it. We desire bottom facts.

Humboldt remarked that "a presumptious skepticism that rejects facts without examination of their truth is in some respects more injurious than unquestioning credulity."

We hail with delight every advance in material science, but agree with Prof. Fiske, as reported in his "Unseen World," that from the very definition of the terms matter and spirit, the existence of spirit cannot be demonstrated to the senses, and that thus no theory is amenable to scientific tests.

The testimony in such a case must, he says, under the conditions of the present life, be forever inaccessible. It lies wholly outside the range of experience. However abundant it may be, we cannot expect to meet it. And accordingly, our failure to produce it does not raise even the slightest presumption against our theory. When conceived in this way, the belief in a future life is without scientific support, but at the same time it is placed beyond the need of scientific support and the range of scientific criticism. "If now," he adds, "men of science will accept the position that spirit is not matter, nor governed by the laws of matter, and refrain from speculations concerning it, restricted by their knowledge of material things, they will withdraw what is to men of religion, at present, their principal cause of irritation."

We are confident that no connection on our part with the "true inwardness" has had aught to do with the facts that hav come direct to and been witnessed by us, facts which Faraday's and Carpenter's theories, Huxley's and Tyndall's lack of time, or the pooh-poohs of the popular scientific bodies do not affect or account for; and until we hav evidence to the contrary, we shall occupy the position of a "progressiv Liberal Spiritualist."

Is human desire based on no probable reality, when it seeks a continuance of life beyond the present? How does it happen that all Materialists call it a pleasant belief if there is no good or truth in it? Its pleasantness makes people better, and for this reason there is so much sunshine in the soul of the genuin Spiritualist.

Many of my Materialistic friends and say to me, "I wish I could believe as you do, I should be more happy." Materialists of a lifetime say to me in letters (and they occupy the front ranks), "I find as I get older that my mind inclines more and more to your way of thinking, and that I love the Spiritualists, but perhaps the wish is father to the thought." I hav yet to meet and know one of our people who has said to a Materialist the same thing. Is there nothing in all this? Are these mental and emotional conditions, that make us more loving, make existence seem complete through this promis, and that lessen the shadows of our present existence, a cheat and delusion? We think not.

It were the merest folly not to rejoice at, and appropriate as much as possible for our benefit, the fruits of the researches and apparent demonstrations of science, but it were equal folly to accept as absolutely true all the claims of the modern scientific school, and while dethroning the pope of theology, substitute science; instead of Pio Nono, and Protestantism with their saints, creeds, and Bibles, bow the knee of superstition to Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, and Darwin.

Can we not be as honest with ourselvs as others, and while firing hot shot at those who oppose us, observe the weakness in our defenses?

Spiritualism, with what (I think) its positiv proof of progressiv continued life, has attaching to it, as illustrated by the conception of many of its professed followers, a vast amount of dross in the shape of the ridiculous and superstitious. This is necessarily the case from the mental status of quite a number of its adherents.

Materialism has had to shift its stakes many times; its positiv arrogant positions of one date hav appeared false and absurd at another. In my first reading in this direction, and which I then believed true, was the assertion that nearly all that was reported as miracles never occurred, because they were a clear violation of all the laws of nature, therefore they were the invention of designing priests to mislead and blind the people.

When the spiritual phenomena demonstrated that history might be true in this respect, without any priestcraft about it, as like things occurred, Materialists said (honestly) these things are the result of natural conditions we did not understand.

Positiv positions of science hav been and still are being proved to hav no little of the absolutely true in them, that the glory of many of the scientific as well as the theological stars lose much of their former luster. Voltaire said, at the close of his useful career:

"I hav spent forty years of my life seeking the truth, and still remain in ignorance. After consulting Plato, Pythagoras, and the orientals my conclusis that chance is a word void of sense. The world is arranged according to mathematical laws."

What concerns me most to-day is not so much what men think as their method in defending their thought, and the all-important necessity of clearing away every legal and superstitious obstruction that prevents honest expression on all matters and questions that directly or remotely concern the race.

We must clear the race of Comstocks from the field, and teach the church "that whatsoever she metes out it shall be measured to her again." That while we will not knowingly do her any injustice, we will defend our own rights with equal pertinacity, and thoroughness.

When we leave off this method of sweeping denunciation, and exhibit no tendency to use the cant phrases of theology to express our dissent from those who see different from ourselvs, we shall be in a better frame of mind to show church adherents that Liberalism is an advance in thought and character.

When we reach that condition we shall not muse as the Kalamazoo skeptic. We shall reserve our pity for some one else than Spiritualists, and will not feel disturbed when others write our belief cold and cheerless. We may rest assured of this fact, at least, that people will discover the good or evil effects our strongest convictions exert upon us by our methods of reflecting them to public and private gaze. It were much better that a certain class staid in the church than for them to put on the mental garb of Liberalism, and then blanket it with the ingrained idiosyncrasies of their former convictions. What I seek is a broad, free-cultured man and womanhood; one that places integrity and justice first; one that is as willing to concede honesty of purpose in others as to claim it for themselvs; a mind that perceives order in diversity, unity in variety, and who rejoices equally at honest differences of opinion as well as at agreement; a mind that is more swift to detect injustice to its opponent than to fight for its pet theories, and finally a courageous soul that dares sweep with its mental vision, and criticise with its judgment and reason, any and everything that are or may be aids to human development and freedom.

Let the scientists push forward their researches, and let all of a religious or spiritual cast of mind bring forth their best fruits. Let the great middle class exhibit their doubt, but let all be governed by a true sense of justice for the rights of each, and exhibit a magnanimity and generosity worthy the best, bravest, and truest Liberal.

A Field Day for Comstock.

Anthony Comstock expects to hav another field day in Albany to-day. The legislativ committee is to take up his bill again. That bill, it will be remembered, is intended to giv his society power to order and direct nearly all public officers below the governor in the performance of their official functions, and to invest Comstock himself, by virtue of his relation to the society, with the authority of a duputy sheriff. Under it, when it passes, he expects to arrest, without warrant, at his own sweet will.

It would appear to most reasonable men that Comstock is already invested with sufficient arbitrary authority. He is enabled to place an espionage upon the mails. He has access to post-offices. Postal officials from the postmaster-general down (it was so in the last administration) fear him. He has already nullified the wholesome rule of evidence that a postmark is prima facie evidence of what it purports, by mailing letters in the New York post-office that hav been postmarked elsewhere. He intercepts and opens letters not addressed to him, for which purpose postmasters hav, by orders, probably, allowed him access to the mails. And now he wants authority to seize and search the person as he has long assumed authority to seize and search the mail.

It is easy enough for Comstock to plead that he has never opened a letter not intended for him. Perhaps not. It is difficult to show the contrary when he so covers his act that none but himself can know. But he cannot deny that he has seized, confiscated, and opened letters in one post-office that were addressed to another name than his and directed to another post-office than that at which he intercepted it. The danger of such a power is evident. Is he to determin of a letter addressed to "T. Runk," for instance, when in course of transmission and before it arrives at its destination, that it is intended for him? Yet he does so judge, and has thereby made the sanctity of the mail a mockery.

And now he, this man whose very sight is repulsiv to every respectable official in the city of New York with whom he comes in contact, whose word is valueless where he has a point to make, whose sworn testimony uncontradicted was recently rejected as worthless by six men in a jury of twelve, who has tempted men to commit crime that he might hav another victim, whose business it is to make crime that he may afterward detect and expose it and punish the wretch who has given way to his wiles, who is notorious for giving false coloring to facts as a witness in his own prosecutions, who has a museum of the vilest literature ever produced which he exhibits to the select among his admirers and visitors, he, Anthony Comstock, asks the legislature to invest him and his society which through him has made more crime already than it has cured, with mandatory authority over the officers of justice.

And to invest him with an odor of respectability, his president, Colgate, goes with him and vouches for his good character. Colgate, who was as guilty of violating the federal law against obscenity as another who was punished, by sending an immoral circular through the mail—in fact more so, for the matter alleged to hav been sent through the mail by the other was not immoral—Colgate, thanks to Comstock and the fact that the district-attorney, Woodford, was a member of their society, escaped the penalty. The proof of mailing was the same in each case.

Let this legislativ committee scan Comstock well. Let them probe him deep. Let them privately get Mr. Rollins's opinion of him, and Superintendent Walling's, and George Bliss's, and Commissioner Deuel's, and Assistant District Attorney Fiero's, and ex-Assistant District Attorney Foster's—yes, and Judge Benedict's. He is a veritable Uriah Heap, worthily despised by every official whose duties hav given them an oportunity to understand his morbid, cunning, merciless, and repulsiv nature. If after that they feel disposed to grant him more extensiv and arbitrary power that he has, let them proceed. We predict for them in that case, to use a favorit expression of his own, that he "will take them in."

No Prohibitory Law.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

Miss Carpenter says that the church would cure the evils of intemperance by prayer, and prayer alone. She says that it can be extirpated by law, and law alone. It will be hard to tell which had hit upon the less efficient remedy. Prayer will not do it; law will not do it. Only education and the bettering of the general condition of the people will gradually subdue the giant of excess. It is more than the work of a day, of a year, of a century. It is more than a legislature can do. It is a work entirely without the scope of legislativ enactment. Habits, customs, tastes, morals, cannot be legislated into or out of people. The law carpenters cannot frame the edifice of the human mind and body, fashioning its inclination, tastes, and desires. Besides, your prohibitory law is an impertinence.

E. C. WALKER.

AN INFIDEL ABROAD. D. M. Bennett's letters from Europe. $1.50.

I have not read the original writings of the early Fathers, nor am I directly familiar with all their quotations, but as authorities I rely upon Prof. F.W. Newman, the accredited author of "Supernatural Religion;" to W. Rathbone Greg, in the "Creed of Christendom;" and to judge Charles B. Waite, in his "History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200." These highly-talented and candid men have devoted many years to the investigation of this subject, having the best of facilities at their command. The concurrent testimony is that Irenæus was the first to refer to or quote from the four gospels as they stand in the New Testament, and that about the year 170. This is a most damaging fact, and unless you can show them to be in error the divine and infallible character of the New Testament falls to the ground. I say again, if those books were not written by those who have been the pretended authors, if nothing was said of the immaculate conception, of the pretended miracles of Jesus, till the latter part of the second century, then a gross imposition has been perpetrated, a gross falsehood has been passed off for truth, and the whole story falls to the ground. If in a half hour's time you are able to show that the scholars named are utterly wrong and that all the Fathers of the first and second centuries were familiar with the four canonical gospels and quoted from them, and that those gospels were read in the church prior to the year 170, of course you will do so. It seems hardly necessary for me to urge you to this course. The character and authority of the New Testament and the Christian religion depends upon it, and if you can, you will certainly give fully the instances where the Fathers have alluded to or quoted the five books—the four gospels and Acts.

You speak about a gospel by Matthew which was written in Hebrew. Let me assure you that whatever Matthew might have written in Hebrew, nothing of it remains now. The gospel of the New Testament called Matthew's was written in Greek, and not in Hebrew, so of course it was not written by Matthew, who only wrote in Hebrew. If you find that our gospel of Matthew was not written by Matthew I hope you will have the candor to acknowledge it.

From your own showing there are but meager proofs of the authenticity and reliability of the early Christian writings. You say very little of their writings have survived. Judge Waite comes to a very similar conclusion; in summing up his thorough investigations he says: "In taking a general review of the first hundred and seventy years of the Christian religion, the first thing that strikes the mind is the dearth of the material from which to construct a reliable history. It is seen at once how much must rest upon probability in its different degrees—how much must be relegated to the province of speculation. The works of the only church historian who wrote during that period, lost or destroyed—the few fragments that are left, being of comparatively no value—the writings of Porphyry and others who wrote against Christianity, and those of the heretic Christians, all destroyed—there remain only the works of some of the orthodox Fathers, and a text of those in a mutilated and corrupted condition. . . . The complete and living form of Christianity is wanting. With the exception of the epistle of Clement of Rome, written near the close of the first century, and a few scattering writings afterward, there is but little in the Fathers of that day to remind one of the pure and lofty morality of Jesus, or the fervid utterances of the apostles to the Gentiles. The Fathers of the second century were, with united energies, engaged in the work of suppressing heresy. Justin Martyr was writing against the Jews, Tertullian against Marcion, and Irenæus against all the heretics. This raid against those who differed from the established faith left but little time to cultivate the more kindly Christian graces, and finally culminated in the establishment of a power which should be competent for the suppression of heresy by force. Another thing that strikes the attention, in a comprehensive review of the period, is the ignorance and superstition even of the most enlightened and best educated of the Fathers. Their bigotry has been noticed—their ignorance and superstition were no less.

"With rare exceptions they were men who utterly despised that learning of the heathen which consisted in attempts to ascertain the laws of the material universe. Construing in the narrowest and strictest sense the maxim that the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, they confined themselves almost exclusively to an exposition of the Jewish scriptures, and of the sayings of Christ construed in the light of those scriptures, drawing, oftentimes, in the application of the prophecies, the most fanciful and whimsical analogies. Their credulity was unbounded. They had a sublime disregard for truth, not so much from perversity as from carelessness and indifference to its sacred character. Their unscrupulousness when seeking for arguments to enforce their positions is notorious, as well as the prevalence among them of what are known as pious frauds. Jones, himself a zealous Christian writer, says that Justin Martyr, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Lactantius made use of testimonies out of forgeries and spurious books to prove the very foundation of the Christian revelation; and it is believed on good grounds that Irenæus was no better. This Father, while engaged in the introduction of gospels which show that the ministry of Christ lasted from one to three years, not longer than three and a half, himself declares that it lasted about twenty years, and that he had the tradition from the elders of Asia, who had obtained it from John and the other apostles.

"Such is the material at the hands of the historian. Of course he cannot rely implicitly upon the unsupported assertion of any such writer for the truth of any historical fact whatever. In every instance he is obliged to scrutinize carefully and endeavor to ascertain whether any ulterior motives may have prompted whatever statement may be under consideration. If he can find none, and the fact stands uncontradicted by other writers, it is cautiously accepted. Under such circumstances progress is slow and uncertain. The most that any writer can hope to accomplish is to place in proper shape what is already known, and to establish here and there a landmark for the benefit of subsequent historians.

"In conclusion, as the result of this investigation, it may be repeated that no evidence is found of the existence in the first century of either of the following doctrines: the immaculate conception, the miracles of Christ, his material resurrection. No one of these doctrines is to be found in the epistles of the New Testament, nor have we been able to find them in any other writings of the first century. As to the four gospels, in coming to the conclusion that they were not written in the first century we have but recorded the conviction of the more advanced scholars of the present day, irrespective of their religious views in other respects, with whom the question, as now presented, is, How early in the second century were they composed? Discarding as inventions of the second century, having no historical foundation, the three doctrines above named, and much else which must necessarily stand or fall with them, what remains of the Christian religion?"

But I have transcended my limits. I must close.

Yours in the hope that you may yet see and accept the truth, D. M. B.

Letters from Friends.

BRIDGEPORT, CAL., March 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please put my name down for your trip around the world. W. A. LOOSE.

ISLAND CITY, March 6, 1881.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: Put me down for $5.00 to aid you in the trip around the world. That is just what we want, some one to go around the world and let the people know what is going on. I hope that there will be enough to put down their $5.00 to justify you in going. It will be one of the grandest acts of your life in helping lift the minds of humanity. You are doing a great work in liberating minds that could not be reached in any other way than the course you are taking. I am, dear sir,

Yours for truth, W. H. DORRIS.

PORT TOWNSEND, N. Y., March 9, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You may put me down for a "V," so as to enable you to make the trip around the world.

A. VINCENT.

CASEY, IOWA, March 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: "John's Way" is tip-top; lots of such damnable hypocrisy as that little pamphlet represents is practiced here in our little town every day. When you get ready to undertake the big trip that is talked of now I will try to hav $5.00 ready for your use. Yours for truth and friendship,

J. W. HAGEN.

MADISON, O., March 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please count me as one of the four hundred to send $5.00 for your trip around the world and $1.50 for your letters from Europe. The money will be ready when called for. Yours with respect,

MRS. SILAS HILL.

LOCUST VALLEY, N. Y., March 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav your kind letter and acceptable intention of publishing my reply to friend Wakeman's "Lessons," after his series are finished.

As I long since wrote to you my $5.00 is ready at any time when you determin to undertake that "Round the World Trip," and though your enjoyment of such would be much, as you deserve, and your reliable and intelligent observations would be very entertaining and instructiv, yet beside the risks of extensiv travel, we would, for a long time, miss your home usefulness in aiding the overthrow of gross superstitions everywhere surrounding us, which givs to the question of such long absence and risks, by the way, in conjunction with acquired knowledge to be agreeably imparted to the eager public, when successfully accomplished, a twofold interest, and so if you had no TRUTH SEEKER interests at home I would say go if you can, but with such interests stay if not irresistibly impelled to go; so the question I think must rest with you, as your friends seem inclined to pay the expenses.

In this connection of your usefulness, I cannot refrain from expressing my high appreciation of your "What Objections to Christianity?" reply to Mr. Mair, as being remarkably lucid and forcible in the reasoning, and, with the numerous and important authorities cited, should be convincing to all fair minds of the absurdity of all claims to inspirations from God at any period of human history, and especially in the self-evident fact that an inspirer could not giv himself such a character as such claims present; and so I think your treatment of that subject will add a host to the already large army of unbelievers in divine inspirations—autobiographies—to man.

In further corroboration of such sensible conclusions, I may add that in an editorial in New York Times of March 9th on "English Ritualism" he quotes the opinion of the intellectual head of the English church, "Dean Stanley of Westminster Abbey, and a host of lesser men, who regard the scriptures as in no sense more inspired or more infallible than the histories of Herodotus." I am your fellow truth seeker and warm friend, CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

PRATTSBURGH, N. Y., March 19, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Please accept my thanks for your grand, good paper which I cannot get along without, and put the undersigned names down for your book of travels round the world. Yours respectfully,

GEORGE H. LOOK,
LUTHER WHEELER,
JAS. H. STURTEVANT.

NORTH BENTON, O., March 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The long winter is about broken, and we are now in the midst of sugar making. Gathering sap and boiling pleases the young folks, though it is hard work. The Christians say we will go to hell for gathering and making sugar on the Lord's day, but the sap runs on the Lord's day, and the Christians say the Lord does everything, so I guess he won't growl if we make sugar on his day. At all events, the Christians don't complain if we giv them the products of the Lord's day, sugar or anything else. I hav not seen the new Bible the Christians hav got up. I am told they left out hell altogether. How will they manage to make the new phrase rhyme—Hades, fire, damnation, and brimstone? They will fix it up some way and tell their dupes that God made a mistake; when he said hell he meant Hades.

Within please find three dollars to pay for the paper, and put me down for five dollars for the trip round the world. Has the Delaware judge found any Hades for Ingersoll? if so, I wonder what kind of Hades. I wonder if Delaware has a whipping post.

Yours, etc., CHESTER BEDELL.

LEETONA, O., March 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1 to keep my paper going another four months. Please put me down for $5 for the trip round the world, and you will much oblige a well-wishing friend.

HUGH DALRYMPLE.

ORWELL, ONT., CAN., March 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please put down my name for $5 on the list for a trip around the world.

William Edwards, Aylmer, Ontario, wishes you to put his name down for $5 for your trip around the world. Yours, J. C. STEVENS.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 23, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is an article entitled "A Trip Around the World." From the tone of it I judge there hav been previous articles on the same subject, but they escaped my attention.

You do not make it quite clear whether the $5 is to entitle the subscriber to a book or if that will be extra. I don't care myself, but others might want to know.

I like the idea very much. I will subscribe $20, and I will take ten of the books. Yours truly,

A. S. WHEELER.

[REPLY.—We inform our friend that the five dollars advanced to help pay the expense of the journey entitles the party who advances it to a copy of the work, consisting of two or three volumes—there will not be less than two—and one of them will be issued while we are away, and will be sent to those who hav subscribed. It is believed the work will be worth every cent of the money.—ED. T. S.]

SALINA, KAN., March 16, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Nothing better than "Constructiv Liberalism" has ever been published. I expect you will publish it in pamphlet form. I want it, anyhow.

I would like to see you circumnavigate the world. If I hav not sent in my name, as so many did, it is because I hav not the money. I am poor, and consequently becoming poorer. But you can count on me for the book when it shall be published.

Yours for the war against religions,

JOSEPH HENRY.

CROSS PLAINS, WIS., March 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $3 for your paper for another year. You can put me down for $5 for the trip around the world. I want the books. I think that three hundred subscribers, at $5 apiece, will not be sufficient to pay for the books and your expenses. Would it not be better to wait until fall, for I think it will be much easier for many to get $10 after harvest than $5 now, especially those living in the rural districts, like myself, and raise the amount to $3,000? The money must be paid before you start, and plenty of it in order to make it a success. I hav traveled some, and I know that $3,000 is less than you can afford to do the job for and do it as you would like to. Of course, you want to giv every one as near as you can the worth of their money. If you do not go until fall you can put me down for $10. Yours respectfully,

A. M. PARTRIDGE.

SAGINAW CITY, MICH., March 20, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I desire to avail myself of the privilege (accorded in your last issue) of expressing myself on your proposed trip round the globe. As an old friend, let me advise you by all means not to do so. I could giv you a number of reasons, but let this one suffice, the old saying, "When the cat's away the mice will play." You hav, by industry and energy, made THE TRUTH SEEKER what it ought to be—the leading Freethought paper in the world. And I believe I speak the unanimous sentiment of our League when I advise you to stay at home, sharing the pleasures and sorrows of life with your amiable spouse, and not trust the helm of affairs to any one but yourself. As long as you steer the ship we are willing to be passengers; but should you be absent, a mutiny might arise, the result of which could be disastrous to the craft.

Now I will make a proposition to you, which will be less expensiv, and, in my humble opinion, more instructiv to your readers and others than a narrativ of a trip around the world. Ask his satanic majesty to renew his correspondence with you in relation to the creation and formation of this and other worlds. When completed, I will giv $5 for the lectures in book form. I believe if you make this proposition to your readers a large majority of them would subscribe for the book at some reasonable price. Hoping you are enjoying good health, I remain,

Yours sincerely, THOMAS L. JACKSON.

[REPLY.—Our friend may be quite correct in his opinion that it will be better for us to remain at home, but we wish to assure him that, should we make the journey, we shall leave the paper, etc., in such hands as we are sure will continue it as good as it is now. We believe the only failure it will meet with will be on the part of such readers as do not remit when their subscriptions are due. If all our readers would pay up as promptly and honestly as a portion of our patrons do the paper would not fail. It lies wholly with friends over the country whether it fail or not. Our part here will be faithfully performed.—ED. T. S.]

LOCKPORT, ILL., March 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I had hoped on your return from Brussels that you would be allowed to settle down quietly to enjoy the comforts of home life and preside over and manage the very useful and very important TRUTH SEEKER. In this it appears that a large number of others and myself are doomed to disappointment. To me it is a matter of very serious import. And yet as so many whose intelligence and judgment I admire and respect in the main seemed to float with this tide, I thought it might be best to hold my peace and watch the outcome of what appears to be a very injudicious and unwise procedure.

Your remarks in your last issue, in which you call on all for or against the journey to freely express their opinions, hav induced me to tell in as plain a manner as possible why I think such a journey as you and the donors contemplate a positiv injury to the cause, a partial wreck to true home life, and a senseless risk of your life for the little it is possible to gain as compared with what any reasonable Liberal is well aware we must lose.

My first objection finds its root in the fact that Mrs. Bennett has rights American Liberals ought to respect, and which it seems to me they do not in their purpose to send you away from home for years to do justice to a trip round the earth. Your weary months in prison and your trip to Europe ought to satisfy the most exacting. You and Mrs. Bennett are nearing the evening, where the shadows grow long, and you should remain with each other to fill up life's latter day with the sunshine that shines from loving hearts and daily and hourly association.

Another important reason is, THE TRUTH SEEKER succeeds better with you at the helm than it does in your absence, and, in order to be honest with you and others, I think the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER can be better used than filled as they must be with your letters if you go abroad. Why do I believe this? For this reason, that the most important battle is here and now. We are contending for the rights of free speech and an unmuzzled press. We wish no religious censorship in the form of Colgate or Comstockism. We desire to make this country at least religiously and politically free. We desire our constitutional as well as natural right respected. I am well aware that your epistles would be very instructiv and pleasant reading, and doubtless, should you write them, I and mine would enjoy their reading. First let us do the most needed thing, and let us concentrate our efforts and your abilities for this one great end. As the presiding genius of THE TRUTH SEEKER you will be an immense power for good in accomplishing the freedom of speech and the press, whereas when we spread you over the whole earth and draw you like a girdle around it we shall make you very thin for good in the great struggle here for true liberty of the voice and pen.

You are the Garrison of our movement, THE TRUTH SEEKER takes the place of the grand old Liberator, and it seems as needless to me to send you "galvanting round the world" as it would hav been for us old antislavery men and women to send Garrison on such a trip to write up European, African, and Asiatic despotisms. Another analogy truly relevant would hav been for the Germans during the Franco-Prussian war to hav sent Von Moltke at that time on a similar errand to study and write up the ancient and modern methods of warfare of other nations, with particular instructions to be on hand when each got up a dress parade.

If they desire to let you hav a rest and a good time generally let the amount be doubled and trebled so that your wife may accompany you and share alike the sunshine and shadow.

I am gratified to learn that so many Liberals hav a spare V or X, and as they are liberal, do they not honestly think the money could be spent to much better advantage in sowing the seed of Liberal and Radical truth in our midst? Let Mr. Bennett hav $1,000 to strengthen THE TRUTH SEEKER, and T. C. Leland $1,000 to strengthen the Liberal League, and its mission for good will be immense. Such a course would tell on the nerves of Colgate and his tools very unpleasantly, while money spent on our foreign mission would make them chuckle with delight. Bennett away is a source of delight. Bennett at home causes fear and affright. Judge you which is best for the truth and the right.

You and I know that your trip is to be from the very first stage one of hazard and unremitting and ceaseless toil. Your letters from Europe are the type of what is expected if you take the contemplated trip, and in order to do this your leisure time for recreation will be less than at your time of life will be necessary and just. If you go, no one will feel more anxious than myself that your journey will be passed in safety, and that in all respects you will be and feel fully compensated for the undertaking.

Of this I am confident, that those who desire you to take the trip are but a minority of the well wishers and supporters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, though happily at this time they hav a more abundant supply of ready cash. I hav little hopes, yet most earnestly desire you may not go, and that the money held in readiness for that purpose will be freely offered to make your home more cheery, your paper more prosperous, and the Liberal League more effectiv.

Yours truly, GEORGE LYNN.

[REPLY.—With great respect for Bro. Lynn's opinion, we wish to say we think he takes a rather gloomy view of what might possibly be the case if we make that journey round the world. There is no necessity if that event should take place for THE TRUTH SEEKER being any less effectiv than now, for the warfare against error and superstition being slackened, nor for the banner of truth to at all trail in the dust. Valiant soldiers will be left to continue the battle in case we go; the paper will be vigorously conducted; several able friends will make special effort to contribute good articles, and we doubt not Bro. Lynn will himself do something in that way. As for our own part, we hope to be able to send in weekly that which will prove to be quite as interesting as what we write when at home. As to our physical ability to stand the journey, we hav no fears on that ground. Our strength and endurance still stands at par. The dangers of traveling are little greater than staying at home. Danger cannot be wholly escaped anywhere. Perhaps danger to health, life, and limb is as great here in New York as it is in India or Japan. The death rates here in New York are greater per thousand inhabitants than a majority of places in the world. As to dealing hard blows to the devotees of superstition and falsehood, we hope to do that yet many years, whether we are on this side of the globe all the time or not. We shall not, however, undertake the journey unless the receipts of the one thing needful are sufficient to justify it. If that is done, we stand pledged to make the journey.—ED. T. S.]

WACONDA, KAN., March 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You suggest in the last paper that your patrons express themselvs on the propriety of your world-wide trip. I say, Do just as you please; and that you will do anyway. I hav carefully watched you from the first, and whether I willed it or not you always take the bravest leap, and it always wins. As to leaving the office, for several years I hav thought that it would be better for all parties if you would travel some. In '76 I talked with D. R. Burt in Philadelphia as to the propriety of furnishing the means to pay for a trip to Europe, but I always considered that to visit the different parts of this country, together with Mrs. Bennett, would enhance both the happiness of yourselvs and the prosperity of the paper before all other things, but you hav chalked out your path, and it is a very useful one to us all, and we will all pray our very best for your safe return, and then I hope that the many Leagues of the country will be more numerous and prosperous and that we shall all be able to take by the hand the man that dared to do it, and the gal that staid at home to watch the speckled hen that she didn't fly away. As ever, thy friend,

GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

TURNER'S FALLS, MASS., March 26, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I hand you five dollars to help you make that journey round the world. If you do not go, use the money to spread the truth.

Yours truly, GEO. E. HARTLEY.

HORNELLSVILLE, March 22, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Apply the inclosed $5 to the fund for the restoration of Thomas Paine's monument.

You will hear from me again when the subscription is called for to erect a memorial to the greatest and best of men in my estimation, and at some future time I would like to write you my thoughts on and interest in the project.

Yours with respect, MRS. ADELE MCDOUGAL.

No. 3 UNION PARK, BOSTON, MASS., March 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I owe you many thanks for your notice of me in your paper.

I hav issued No. 1 of "The Infidel Pulpit." I hope you will find it radical enough to please you. I find myself growing every day more impatient with the utter falsity and maliciousness of the church. We are getting along splendidly at Paine Hall. Last Sunday, in spite of rain, the hall was entirely full, gallery and all.

We hav a great work before us as Liberals, and I hope that though owing to our cultivation of individuality we each hav our different way of working, we shall all work earnestly toward the one great end of enthroning reason in the place of superstition. I am anxious to secure as large a circulation for my lectures as possible. It will take two thousand to pay expenses, and as yet I hav only four hundred. I hav started it, however, in confidence that with your generous assistance in noticing my efforts with that of other Liberal friends, I shall secure even more than that number during the year.

Giv my kind regards to Mrs. Bennett, and accept the same for yourself. Yours truly,

GEORGE CHAINEY.

EDWARDSBURG, MICH., March 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.00 for the dear TRUTH SEEKER another year. We think it is the best paper we hav ever had; we cannot do without it; may it and its editor long liv to feed the starving souls of humanity. Yours in truth,

MRS. ELISHA FLINT.

WESTFIELD, N. Y., March 10, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Please allow me to ask for information. The coins that are now issued from the United States mint hav "In God we Trust" substituted for the E Pluribus Unum of the founders of the republic. Has this change been made by act of Congress or at the instance of those who claim that the universe is subject to a monarch? I am taking three Greenback papers and hav a number of sample copies sent me, and I hav inquired of all why the principles on which our republic is founded, that the powers that govern are derived from the governed, is not made a leading plank in the Greenback platform, but can get no answer. Is this principle embodied in the platform of the Liberal League? If so I cannot find it. Hav we become so craven we dare not assert the principles by which we exist as individuals and on which our republic is founded? An answer would much oblige Yours truly,

J. TENNEY.

AURORA, ILL., March 22, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Permit me to say that I am more than pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would rather be deprived of any two of the seven papers I am taking than it. Find one dollar for four months' subscription. So it seems that you think of taking a trip around the world. I do not wish to be considered inquisitiv, but in the name of all good, who will you find that is able to take the helm and run that paper as you hav done? I presume to say that it cannot be done, as there is but one Bennett in the sense to which I refer. If you take the trip around the world I fear the paper will be made over to the devil of neglect in your absence. Permit me to offer a suggestion. This old earth revolves from west to east once in twenty-four hours. All that you will hav to do is to station youself in mid air some half mile above the earth's surface, and let her roll. Once in twenty-four hours you can drop from your perch, attend to the business of the office, then rise again; earth will do the traveling while you are taking note of matters and things going on below you.

A foolish suggestion, methinks I hear you say. Possibly, but I do not consider it any more so than your trip around the world.

"A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." However, it may be that the Lord is needing another Jonah about this time, yet withal, you may not fare as well as that other chap did. Far better remain at your post and run THE TRUTH SEEKER in the interest of humanity than to take the chances of making fish food of yourself; they can do without you, we cannot, if it be possible to keep you on the track as an editor and ink slinger.

Fraternally yours, R. R. HALL, M.D.

Cornell's Building.

BY ALHAZA.

"This is the house that Jack built."
—English Roundelay.

This is the murderer, caught in the act,
Who built up a tragedy, founded on fact;
And screwed up the rack in the Albany jail,
While his skeleton brother waxed weary and pale.

He screwed it by night, and he screwed it by day,
'Till his heart-strings were broke and his flesh dropped away;
He propped him with hope, he rent him with fear,
'Till nothing was left but a moan and a tear.

"Why, just let him suffer and he will repent,
I'll pardon him some day if I can relent;
I'll draw the strings tight to hold power and pelf.
Could I pity the fallen, and pardon myself?"

And to sneak through the world, it is horrible too,
While Freethinkers cast their bright arrows at you;
Yes, rather than bear the poor criminal's sting,
And not govern all, I'd commit the same thing.

So who hav we now to administer laws,
Hyenas, or bears, with their terrible claws?
So fierce Valentinian stood by a cage,
To see a poor criminal torn by their rage.

But you throw him in, and run softly away.
Your own turn will come on some wild burning day;
The oven shall glow in your merciless soul,
While thunders of conscience shall mutter and roll.

Much darker than forgery, blacker than night,
To wreck a man's craft, when his home is in sight;
His children all weeping, his wife standing pale,
Because for one moment his firmness did fail.

The priest who baptized you the day you were born
Will stand by your death-bed, all shaven and shorn;
If you ask him to pray he will calmly reply,
"You hav nothing to fear, for a flint cannot die."

A Good Time with the Devil.

A DREAM.—BY W. P. ROGERS.

Tune—Joe Bowers.

One night in silent slumber, all curled up in a heap,
The following I dreamed, sir, while I was fast asleep,
I dreamed myself the meanest man that I had ever seen,
And that every action of my life was rascally and mean.

dreamed that I was all alone near by a river clear, n solitude did meditate—no one I thought was near—
I saw what I supposed a man, approaching me alone,
All o'er with sooty blackness his body brightly shone.

His tail was ten feet long or more, and dragging on the ground,
A three-foot horn grew from his head, like iv'ry, hard and sound;
His eye was like a fire-ball, he having only one,
I tried to run and shouted loud, Oh, dear, the devil's come,

He modestly addressed me, some words I will not tell,
Quoth he, "I am the devil, I've just emerged from hell;
My name," quoth he, "is Lucifer, the old he-one of all;
I've been the champion devil e'er since old Adam's fall."

I dreamed he took me on his arm, saying, "I'll return you well."
And then he rose into the air and flew away to hell.
In just one half an hour, sir, old Lucifer and I,
Were in that fiery pit, sir, where sinners roast and fry.

Apollyon next to Lucifer all hell did now command,
And on a roll of brimstone his highness he did stand;
His voice like distant thunder most loudly he did roar,
While into hell by thousands the souls of priests did pour.

The devil showed me Moses, in torment he did groan,
With fifty little devils a pelting him with stones;
Ten devils had old Joshua, with long and nubby tails,
Bent o'er a roll of brimstone a pounding him with flails.

King David in a pot I saw, ten feet across the top,
In red-hot liquid brimstone old Dave did bound and hop;
Old Solomon was there too, a roasting in that lake;
Eight devils had him by the hair, like bull dogs they did shake.

One hole I saw in hell, sir, 'twas more than ten miles deep,
Where popes and priests and deacons were tumbled in a heap;
Ten thousand ring-tailed devils with each a mighty horn
Were tumbling down their brimstone to keep the rascals warm.

Six little filthy evils (each one had lost his tail)
Had Lot and his two daughters a riding on a rail;
Old Noah I saw stark naked, the same as in his tent;
"Oh, I'm in hell for getting drunk," he said, as on he went.

Quoth Lucifer, "Come hurry on, I hav two other pits,
Both of them are deep and broad and filled with hypocrits;
It takes ten thousand devils to keep those rascals straight,
We hav no subjects in our hell that we so badly hate."

I now began think that I was not so mean a man,
For a thousand times ten thousand were meaner in this clan.
Lucifer then gave a yell, which caused an awful smoke,
And, being nearly scared to death, a trembling I awoke.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT
Your Case is Curable! DOCTOR FELLOWS You must Not Despair!
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.
Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:
"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."
The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.
A GREAT DOCTOR.
Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."
Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.
Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,
Vineland, N. J.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.
The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."
This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:
The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING

IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.

Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.

Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.

Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.

Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection to all classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone who hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.

NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.

JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DeT. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DeT. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apopiexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

NO. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH.

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself, he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 481 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Cliuton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACOEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

A FEELING of superiority to others, with love and honor for them, is the ground of complacency and condition of chronic happiness. A feeling of superiority to others, with alienation from them and hate for them, is the sure condition of perturbations and unhappiness.—W. R. Alger.

INDISCRIMINATE alms-giving, mere alms-giving, is the very mother of pauperism. We see in some Catholic countries how the alms-giving which the church has taught in the very words of Christ has degraded whole populations—has taken from manhood its real dignity and strength.—C. C. Everett.

THE judgments of God, if there be a God, are never arbitrary. He does not hold blessing in one hand and cursing in another, and giv each, by an outward bestowal, as he may see that it is deserved. Men's acts drag their consequences after them. . . . It is not an angry God that pursues the sinner; it is his own sin that has found him out. Men do reap the fruit of their own sowing.—C. C. Everett.

THE whole conception of Virgil's "Hell" is grand and terrific. Highly material and sensational, it is hardly more so than medieval divines and artists hav represented; and indeed it is more than probable that, consciously or unconsciously, they often adopted pagan notions on the subject. In its moral teaching, whether the poet intended his descriptions to be taken in their literal sense or interpreted in the way of parable, his creed has at least the essential elements of truth.—Collins' Virgil.

THE word "pious," it must be remembered, implies in the Latin the recognition of all duties to one's country and one's parents, as well as to the gods. And in these senses Æneas would deserve it. But to an English mind [and still more to an American] the piety which pleads the will of heaven as an excuse for treachery to a woman only adds a deeper hue of infamy to the transaction. It

"Doth make the fault the worse by the excuse."
—Collins' Virgil.

MILL'S unsolicited election to Parliament was a triumph not often shared by social reformers; it was as exceptional as Bright's admission to a seat in the Cabinet or Stanley's appointment as Dean of Westminster. Such anomalies will happen in a country, fortunately, so full of anomalies as England; but, as a rule, a political reformer must not be angry if he passes through life without the title of Right Honorable; nor should a man, if he will always speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, be disappointed if he dies a martyr rather than a bishop.—Max Muller.

CONSCIENCE, like religion, is man's strength and his weakness. Conscience makes cowards of us all; it is the strong-siding champion which makes heroes of us all. Savages are cruel, pirates are cruel; but they cannot be as cruel as a good man with a misguided conscience. The most savage heart has some touch of human kindness left in it which nothing can quite conquer—nothing but conscience. That can make a man as hard as Alpine rock, as cold as Greenland ice. The torture rooms of the Inquisition surpass the cruelties of the North American Indian. The oruelties of instinct are faint compared with the cruelties of conscience.—Dr. J. F. Clarke.

IN nothing is the untrustworthiness of the gospels, as to all exterior circumstances, more conspicuous than in their assigning to the communication of this most important prayer, commonly called the Lord's Prayer, totally different times, different antecedents, and different surroundings. For whereas Matthew brings it within his all-comprehensiv Sermon on the Mount (Matt. vi, 9-13), Luke causes it to be taught in "a certain place" where Jesus was praying (Luke xi, 1-4). Matthew makes Jesus deliver it spontaneously; Luke, in answer to the request of a disciple; the former to a vast audience, the latter to the disciples alone.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

YOU Christians first declare an intangible, inconceivable something exists, and then declare all must believe this a "fact" or be lost But not one actual proof hav you given that a God is or ever was. You cannot show one fact that declares a God or manifests his works. I hav just as much right to say Minerva, the goddess of wisdom and the daughter of Jupiter, who sprang from his head completely armed, really existed and was the constant protector of Ulysses. and, under the form of Mentor, traveled with Telemachus in search of his father, as you hav to say Jehovah really lived and traveled in the pillar of fire and did all the wonderful things the old book says he did. All ancient history tells of Minerva, while your Jew God has only one book for his biography. But he is in fashion now, and all the other gods are out of fashion. Had you lived when Jove ruled supreme you would hav declared all safety depended upon belief in him. The law put to death or banished presumptuous Atheists who denied the Greek and Roman gods, just as it now puts in prison, tyrannizes over, and punishes those who deny the Mosaic God.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

IT is an old saying, but a very pretty one, that a blush is like a girl, for it becomes a woman.

THERE is great joy when a doctor turns religious. The church recognizes that it has secured a new pillar.

WHEN you ask a Boston girl for a kiss, she replies, "I hav no objection to a platonic osculation, but permit me, first, to remove my glasses."

A CHICAGO paper says the best scheme for improving the Mississippi river would be something to prevent the St. Louis people from bathing in it.

AND now a Vermont lady, aged 96, comes to the front with a bedquilt having a constituency of 960 pieces. But judge her not harshly. Perhaps this is a lie.

THEY were playing a game of croquet, when he stumbled over one of the arches. "I wish I were where the wicked cease from troubling," he remarked. "But you can't be," said she, smiling archly, "so long as you go the way of the wicket."

"MY wife won't even hear of my going to the theater with another lady," said Gallagher. Ragbag didn't seem to construe Gallagher's remark aright, for he said: "Won't, eh? Don't be too sure of it. I thought my wife wouldn't, but she did, and I had a fearful time about it."

"ARE you the tax collector of this ward?" he asked, as they rode together on the platform of the car.

"No."

"Assessor?"

"No."

"Water works man?"

"No."

"Anything to do with the census?"

"Nothing of the sort. Why do you ask?"

"Why, I saw you coming out of a house on Sproat street the other day with with two chairs, a broom, and an ottoman flying after you, and I said to myself that you were an official or agent of some sort, and had unintentionally offended the woman."

"No, I'm no official or agent," replied the man, in a lonesome voice. "I liv there, and that woman was my wife. Savey?"

"You bet!" was the sympathetic response, and they crept closer together and took a chew from the same box.

A MAN with a black eye called upon a Griswold street lawyer recently and said:

"I hav been knocked down."

"Good case—good case, if you hav any witnesses," was the smiling reply.

"I've got this black eye and an old woman for witnesses."

"Correct—correct. I'll take the evidence and see you through."

"For how much?"

"Well, the whole thing won't cost you over six or eight dollars."

"And what'll I get?"

"Justice, of course."

"And what'll the other man get?"

"Oh, he'll probably be fined $5."

"Say, you go to grass!" suddenly remarked the plaintiff. "You must think I'm a fool to pay $6 or $8 and hav the bother of a lawsuit, when three different men are just aching to lick the feller in rotation at only $1 a head! I'm not purty-looking, but I'm no cundurango."

A STORY ABOUT MAHONE.

Virginia's new senator elect is physically a man in miniature. Mentally, if his opponents are fit judges, he weighs something like a ton; but on the scale he tips the beam at less than a hundred pounds. In appearance he is as lean and thin as a greyhound; and it is doubtful if his avoirdupois in gross could be made to yield adipose sufficient to lubricate the wing of a humming bird. The following pretty good story illustrativ of his exceeding leanness is told of him: During the late war, while in command of a division of Confederates, he, like many others, had the misfortune to be wounded; but, as it happened on that occasion, not seriously. An acquaintance, about to visit Richmond, was requested to call upon the General's wife for the purpose of relieving any anxiety she might feel on account of her absent lord by explaining the nature and extent of his injury. Col. —— called at the lady's residence, and, as report goes, found her in tears, she having already received the news of her husband's wounding by telegraph. The officer attempted to reassure her by the statements that the General would be on duty again in a few days, but without avail.

"Why, madam," he expostulated, "you ought not to giv yourself so much concern; he received only a flesh wound; no bones are broken."

"Ah, Colonel," she sobbed, "you—don't know th'—General as well as I do—I do or you would not tell m'—me he could be—be wounded without strik—striking a bone!"

CHARLES WOLSHENCROFT, of the Salvation Army, who once came to this country as an evangelist, has been sent to prison in England for stealing a watch. He was arrested while conducting a prayer-meeting, and the watch was found in his pocket. Two other members of the army hav been convicted of thieving.

THE infant human jaw recently found in the Schipka cavern, Moravia, seems, according to Prof. Schauffhausen, to be one of the most remarkable relics of paleolithic man yet discovered. To judge by the development of the the teeth, the jaw belonged to a child of less than a year old, but its size and the size of its teeth is that of an adult. In many respects it shows intermediate peculiarities between those of the lowest existing savages and the anthropoid apes.

A NEGRESS, one hundred years old, died suddenly, to all appearances, in Point Coupee Parish, Louisiana, a short while ago, but in the midst of preparations for her burial she revived again, and seemed as well as ever. This circumstance has created a frenzy of excitement among all the negroes of the district, who firmly believe that the old woman was really dead and has come to life again, and that she can, in consequence, cure the lame, sick, and blind, and perform all kinds of miracles.

THE Berlin society for training carrier pigeons recently published some interesting details concerning the rapid flight of these birds. At the last meeting in 1880 the pigeon which won the prize flew in five hours and twenty-seven minutes the distance between Cologne and Berliu, which, as the crow flies, measures 295 miles. This is the most rapid flight which has been known. The Berlin society owns 1,500 old carrier pigeons, and during last year bought 350 young pigeons for Paris, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Belgium, with a view to ameliorate the breed by a mixture of new blood.

THE Protestant Episcopal Society for the Increase of the Ministry makes an appeal for money. It needs $10,000 between now and the 1st of September. It is educating about seventy young men for ministerial work. Sixty of the men whom this society has helped were last year engaged in fields of labor in this country, and thirty-five in foreign work. The Episcopal ministry is not so closely crowded as that of some of the other denominations, and there is more chance for a young man who enters it than among some of the others. But the salaries are very small for young men who are beginners.

THE explorations recently made of deep sea bottoms shows a novel constituent of such bottoms to be pumice dust, arising, it is presumed, from submarine volcanic action; so general is it, in fact, that it rarely fails to appear when carefully looked for in any of the dredgings, and it is believed to be the chief origin of the deep sea clays. An additional element, which appears to hav been detected at great depths, is "cosmic dust," or dust formed from aerolites. Another interesting point in these explorations is the finding of manganese peroxide in nodules enclosing orgauic remains—shark's teeth and pieces of bone.

THE evangelical nigger is peeping through the fence of the Bradlaugh prosecution very aggressivly. A Rev. Henry Varley is to contest the re-election of the member from Northampton, and he remarks in his address to the electors, "The man who denies the existence of the divine lawgiver is unfit to legislate." So are men who strive to force their narrow creeds and bigoted beliefs upon the world through laws which defeat themselvs and hold the legislatures that permit their enactment up to the derision of civilized mankind, to whom these relics of inquisitorial barbarism are less the subjects of anger than contempt.

FRANCE is the great republic of Europe, yet its officials violate the mails in order to intercept the correspondence of a political refugee, suspected of complicity in a plot which resulted in the death of a despotic ruler. England, proudly held up as the freest and most liberal government that ever existed, arrests the editor of a newspaper for exercising the freedom of speech it claims to grant to all. In the United States a professional spy wishes to exercise, in his own irresponsible person, the despotic privileges the unworthy governments of France and England hav dishonored themselvs by. Shall Anthony Comstock make a little czar of himself, as he desires?—Truth.

M. MUNTZ, a French scientist, has lately examined spring, river, sea, and rain-water, also snow. He finds alcohol in all except in very pure spring water. By comparison with water holding known quantities of alcohol, rain-water and the water of the Seine are estimated to contain about one gramme per cubic meter. Snow and cold rain seem to contain a little more. The proportion in sea water is much the same. There is evident reason to suppose that alcohol exists in the state of vapor in air. This diffusion of the substance in nature is easily explained by the destruction of organic matter by various agents of fermentation. On this hypothesis one should find a good deal of alcohol in the ground. If this theory is correct, the proper way to avoid the use of alcohol would seem to be to eat and drink nothing.

HOW TO GET OUT OF PURGATORY.—A Roman Catholic church is being built at Atchison, Kansas, with money raised by a novel method. The soul of every person who contributes one hundred dollars is to receive the benefit of a mass every day until the year 1966. "Scrupulous care is given," says the circular of the Benedictine fathers, "to the celebration of this mass in the church itself, and usually on the privileged altar. It may not be amiss to lay stress on this latter circumstance. To a better appreciation of this very extraordinary benefit, it is here added that each time mass is offered for the dead at such an altar a plenary indulgence is imparted to the souls for whose benefit the mass is applied." The Right Rev. Abbot Innocent Wolf, who signs the circular, says that Pope Leo XIII. has bestowed a pontifical blessing on the enterprise.

THE trade in the images of saints is pretty large in this city. A reporter of one of our dailies recently visited a saint shop at 59 Barclay street, the United States agents for an extensiv saint factory in Munich, Bavaria, and upon being taken to an upper floor he found a congregation of nearly all the saints and martyrs in the calendar. The indescribable saintly agony is forcibly depicted upon their countenances, so peculiar to a genuin Christian. Those who would defray the expense of a voyage across the Atlantic and over the continent of Europe to witness the thousands of saint-gods to be seen in the cathedrals and churches may save a considerable sum by visiting the aforesaid saint shop on Barclay street. It is said a duty of 50 per cent has to be paid on saints, which has had the effect to elevate the prices. They were formerly imported as works of art at 10 per cent, but as veritable saints 50 per cent has to be paid. Possibly that is cheap enough for a genuin article of saint-god.

THE probabilities for April, as given by Prof. Vennor, are as follows: There will be sharp frost in the beginning of April, with snow fall on the 4th and 5th, but the spring will open favorably, and everything will be pretty well advanced by April 15th. Floods may be expected in Chicago about the first week in April, with high winds also prevailing in the early part of the month. Snow falls are probable about April 5th. Navigation is likely to open on Lake Ontario about April 7th. The St. Lawrence river will be open about the 9th or 11th, and the first steamship will probably arrive about the 17th or 18th. The weather will be very stormy in the Lower Provinces about the 20th, with very high water prevailing, but in the West April will be a dry month. There will be warm weather just following the 20th, ending in thunder-storms on the 24th and 25th. Snowstorms are probable in the far West on the 25th and 26th, and snow falls are not unlikely to occur in England at the close of the month. The month will end wet and cold, but, on the whole, will be like a May month.

HIGHLY interesting experiments with a newly discovered mineral essence took place a few evenings ago at the laboratory of the eminent Parisian analytical chemist, W. Wuertz. Having filled a lamp with the liquid in question, and ignited the wick, M. Kordig, the discoverer of the essence, tossed the lighted lamp up against the ceiling, besprinkling the bystanders as well as himself with the flaming fluid, which, however, to the astonishment of all precent, proved utterly devoid of heat or burning capacity. He then soaked his pocket handkerchief in the essence and set it on fire; the essence burned itself out, but the handkerchief remained uninjured, as did his hat after subjection to a similar trial. Then Messrs. Wuertz, and Friedel plunged their hands into a pan filled with the burning liquid, withdrawing them with fingers all alight, like so many thick jets of gas. They experienced no sensation of heat whatsoever upon the skin surface thus apparently in a state of activ combustion. Other experiments followed of an equally wonderful nature, conclusivly demonstrating that the Kordig essence is capable of producing light without heat.

NOT long ago the Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby girded up his loins, journeyed to Boston, and smote the radical total abstinence people hip and thigh. Before they hav had time to recover from that onslaught, here is the Rev. Washington Gladden falling foul of them in the Independent. The up-country parson is even more plain spoken than Dr. Crosby was. He says that these intemperately talking "temperance" men coddle the drunkard and reserve their hard words for temperate people who never get drunk, but who are not teetotalers. Upon these they try to heap suspicion and opprobrium. The only value of self-denial is in its voluntariness, yet they seek to make it complulsory. They employ spies and talebearers; they add misrepresentation and slander to intolerance. In the Rev. Mr. Gladden's opinion, they are "doing more to prevent the cure of the evils of intemperance than any other class of persons in the land." In fact, he is disposed to assign them a high place among those who do evil that good may come. He reminds them of St. Paul's declaration that the damnation of such evil doers is just, and says that it is not only just but sure. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Gladden's discretion, no one will question his courage.

Liberty and Purity: How to Secure Both Safely, Effectively, and Impartially.

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON CHARITABLE AND RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES OF THE ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK IN OPPOSITION TO A BILL TO LARGELY INCREASE THE CRIMINAL JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE, MARCH 23, 1881.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN, OF THE BAR OF NEW YORK.

Mr. President, and Gentlemen of the Committee: There are now before the Assembly two important Bills in regard to the Society for the Suppression of Vice, which was incorporated in 1873, and of which Anthony Comstock was the chief originator and is the Agent and practical embodiment.

One of these bills, introduced by Col. M. C. Murphy, of New York, and referred to the Judiciary Committee, contemplates the clipping of the wings of this society.

It is as follows:

§1. In all the courts of this state whenever it shall appear on the trial of a person charged with having violated a penal statute that he was assisted in the alleged violation or induced or inveigled to violate such penal statute by some person acting or claiming to act in the capacity of agent, informer, or spy for any society or association, or for any individual who is not a prosecuting officer under the laws of this state, the testimony of such person so acting or claiming to act as agent, informer, or spy, and also that of every other person acting in conjunction with him, shall not be received in evidence.

§2. All inconsistent acts are repealed.

The other bill, introduced by Mr. Waring, of Kings, and referred to you, contemplates a material enlargement of the jurisdiction and powers of that society.

It is as follows:

§1. It shall be the duty of "the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice"—a corporation created by and existing under the laws of this state, to enforce all laws, now passed, or which may be hereafter passed, in relation to raffling, lotteries, betting, gaming, gambling, schemes and devices to deceive and defraud the public, or obtain money by false pretenses, and obscene and indecent exhibitions and plays.

§2. The police force of the city of New York, as well as of all other places where police organizations exist, shall, as occasion may require, aid this corporation, its members or agents, in the enforcement of all laws which now exist or which may hereafter be enacted for the suppression of the acts or offenses specified in §1 of this act.

§3. Any agent of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, upon being designated thereto by the sheriff of any county of this state, may within such county make arrests, and bring before any court or magistrate thereof having jurisdiction offenders found violating the provisions of any law now passed or which may hereafter be enacted for the suppression of the acts or offenses specified in §1 of this act.

It will be remembered that this Society, by its Act of incorporation, and other Acts passed at its solicitation, already has the powers above asked in regard to "the laws for the suppression of the trade in and circulation of obscene literature and illustrations, advertisements, and articles of indecent and immoral use, as it is or may be forbidden by the laws of the state of New York, or of the United States" (Laws of 1873, chap. 527).

This Society, in a word, asks:

1. That the great body of the laws of the State which affect the morals, literature, and amusements of the people—the most delicate and dangerous of all public acts to administer—should be put under its private judgment and power for execution.

2. That the police shall be subject to its power and the instruments of its unquestioned will.

3. That it may make arrests in any county without warrant upon a general consent of the sheriff.

4. That, by section 7 of its incorporation, it shall have half of the fines of the parties it convicts.

5. That it may have power over all these things without the slightest responsibility to the people or their officers.

The citizens we represent, and we believe a majority of the people of the State, would not approve of either of these bills as they stand.

The objection to the first bill is that it destroys the possibility of evidence in many cases which ought to be punished if we have any laws on these subjects, and retains this Society as our prosecuting agent. The drift of modern legislation is undoubtedly to admit all witnesses to be heard, and then to leave their credibility to the jury; but at the same time it is often provided that no verdict or conviction shall be had on the testimony of informers, spies, and interested persons, without corroboration of disinterested witnesses or of indisputable facts. We venture to suggest such amendment to that bill, which should certainly be passed if this Society is to be left to enforce the laws.

To the second bill, the one before you granting extraordinary powers to this Society, there is a very general and decided opposition, which extends to the whole class of amateur legislation to which it belongs.

We ask leave, therefore, through Mr. Andrews, of New York, to submit a new bill which may in common law and common sense manner obviate the objection to both of the bills referred to, and be reported as a substitute for them, if it, or its substance, should meet with your approval.

The bill presented by Mr. Andrews is as follows:

An Act to provide for the punishment of certain offenses therein named, and to amend chapter 527 of the laws of 1873, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Society for the Suppression of Vice," passed May 16, 1873.

The people of the state of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

§1. The district attorneys of the several counties of this state shall hereafter have exclusive charge, control, and management of all informations, accusations, indictments, and prosecutions of or in regard to all offenses described in the Act to incorporate the Society for the Suppression of Vice passed May 16, 1873, and also of and in regard to all offenses under the laws of this state now passed, or which may be hereafter passed, in relation to raffling, lotteries, gaming, gambling, schemes and devices to deceive and defraud the public or to obtain money by false pretenses, and obscene and indecent exhibitions and plays.

§2. It shall be the duty of said district attorneys as prosecuting officers to make the enforcement of said laws effective, and of all citizens to aid them in so doing. The police force of the city of New York, as well as of all other places where police organizations exist within this state, and all sheriffs, constables, and citizens of this state who may hold the office of postmaster, shall, wherever required, to the extent of their power, aid the district attorney of their respective counties, or any deputy, officer, or detective appointed by him, in procuring evidence of violations of said laws, and in prosecuting the same.

§3. Any district attorney who shall fail faithfully to prosecute a person charged with the violation in his county of any of the laws described in this Act, or who shall fail to faithfully prosecute any offense thereunder which may come or be brought to his knowledge, shall be removed from office by the governor of the state after due notice, and an opportunity of being heard in his defense. As to the sufficiency of such notice and hearing the governor shall determine. Charges before the governor under this section may be preferred by any citizen of the state, but each charge shall contain a particular statement of the facts complained of under the oath of the complainant.

§4. Section 7 of chapter 527 of said Act, entitled "An Act to incorporate the Society for the Suppression of Vice," is hereby repealed, and the objects and duties of that society shall hereafter be limited to the suppression of vice and the prevention of crime by the use of such persuasive, advisory, charitable, educational, missionary, and religious means as it may deem useful for those purposes.

§5. All Acts or parts of Acts inconsistent with this Act are hereby repealed.

§6. This Act shall take effect immediately.

THE QUESTION STATED.

The object of the first bill is evidently to protect liberty. The object of the second is to secure purity and public decency.

Both objects are indispensable. The citizens we represent are equally in favor of both.

It is a question of practical politics, for you to determine, how best to secure each of these objects with the least sacrifice of the other.

How can Liberty and Purity be safely reconciled, and made to sustain each other, by practical legislation, in a popular government?

In the bill, submitted by Mr. Andrews, the answer to this question is, By a return to a strictly secular and responsible accusation under, and administration of, the criminal laws.

This bill is thorough and effective.

By §1. Exactly the same laws, subjects, and powers that this Society has, or asks to have by its proposed bill, are included and provided for.

By §2. The district attorneys are bound to enforce these laws, and the police, postmasters, and all citizens are bound to aid them faithfully and thoroughly.

By §3. If any district attorney is unfaithful in these duties, he can be summarily removed by the governor, who will appoint his successor.

(This section is in substance the clause of our Constitution [Art. 15, §4], in regard to bribery, from whence the suggestion is taken, and which will settle all question as to its propriety. Neglect of duty may also be punished as a misdemeanor under the Revised Statutes, §101 of vol. 3, Bank's edition, p. 983).

By §4. The Society in question is retained as a reformatory and educational body, gifted with all of the powers which this committee, as the committee on charitable and religious societies, would have it peculiarly in its province to grant. The clause giving it one half of the fines inflicted is properly repealed.

What can be more effective for the suppression of vice than the provisions of this Bill? If this Society wish and mean to secure that object and nothing more, why may they not accept it?

Will they?

Certainly not.

We are convinced that the reason that they will not is that they, or their Agents, covet irresponsible power and the use of authority for ulterior purposes. These purposes are not apparent on the face of their Bill, nor avowed, but are nevertheless there, and are hostile to a free, popular government.

That this conviction is well-grounded is not a belief peculiar to us. It is the general and public feeling. The bill presented which wholly prevents the testimony of informers, spies, and agents of this society is but one of the many protests that have been made against this novel system of legal administration and indicates public sentiment.

WHAT THE POWERS ASKED FOR MEAN.

Let us, then, inquire for a moment what this system really is, and what it may become.

It is a method of executing the criminal laws of America, both state and national, by an interstate chain-work of amateur, semi-theological, private societies. I say novel chain-work, for you will remember that this method is new. It began in or about 1872, but is now by no means limited to our state. It has spread rapidly. A network of societies of this kind has been spread over our country from State to State, city to city, until now their chief Agent safely anchored by the aid of United States postal laws, with an "agency" in the United States postal Department (and so practically in every post-office), has become one of the great governing powers of America. At all the important points where government touches the citizen as to his thought or speech or mail matter, or press or mail rights of publication, or amusements or plays or morals, at all of the most delicate and dangerous points of governmental interference with private rights, the Agent of these societies has become practically the irresponsible censor, that is, the dictator.

At his instigation, if not dictation, new laws are passed from year to year by the several states and the general government, declaring new crimes and increasing his powers to execute them. This American government is getting to be too complex. We used to think it enough for each citizen to owe allegiance to the United States government as to the general purposes committed to it by the Constitution, then to our State of New York as to all civil and domestic purposes. But now we have a new Comstock government between, a tertium quid, a nondescript, indefinite third estate, intervened as a new imperium in imperio. This last government is more thought of, talked of, and is really as important to the people as either of the other two, for government means practically only the enforcement of the laws. In this way our laws have passed into the hands of a self-elected nobility, selected by this Agent, who in turn elect and support him. With him they have practically, as to this class of offenses, a monopoly of prosecution. Whom they wish to destroy they can and do destroy; whom they wish to spare they preserve as subjects of grace; for so general and indefinite have they devised and defined these laws that no one—not even their own President (as I will show hereafter)—can escape if they are enforced to the letter.

Note further that these societies form practically an irresponsible theocracy. They and their agents are wholly irresponsible. They are not in that sense officers of the state or general governments, and are not accountable to them nor paid by them, yet they are the embodiment of the laws of both and act for both.

In our State, and, I believe, in other States, they are entitled to half of the fines inflicted upon those they prosecute, but otherwise, and principally, they are supported by the contributions of their wealthy co-religionists, whose feelings are excited by under-breath tales of horrible vice, either exaggerated or exceptional.

They are also amateur societies, that is, they go into the business from the love of it, and the authority, consequence, or money they get from it. Human nature loves power, and the pleasure of its exercise is always a powerful motive.

They are also semi-theological, that is, their motive, inspiration, money, and members come almost exclusively from the so-called Calvinistic sects of Protestantism. They have already largely displaced the police and criminal accusation of the common law, and have largely made the grand jury system a superfluous formality.

Their success has also led to dubious imitations in other fields of government.

Following the example of this Society in our State, which was the pioneer, we now have a brood of Sister Societies monopolizing other branches of legal accusation and discharging the duties and responsibilities formerly resting upon our District Attorneys, Municipal Police, and Magistrates. We are, for example, superintended as to our morals, literature, and amusements by Brother Comstock. Brother Crosby moderates our drinking propensities, and but for his Bible would not leave us a drop. Brother Jenkins presides over the children and their hours of retiring. Brother Bergh is distracted between coddling dogs and flogging men, and has excellent sentimental authority for both. Our game and fish are preserved and caught by selected bits of our aristocracy with the always attendant powers of arrest and prosecution.

Every religious or sentimental fanatic thinks himself elected to worry the Legislature into some "Act to incorporate" him, through the names of his friends, to take charge of and govern his fellow-citizens, and to have the initiation of criminal process given to him which formerly belonged to the people or their officers.

Of course, the police and the ordinary administrators of the Law are superseded and retire almost useless before these legally authorized enthusiasts. The secular officers justly feel this slight and insult to them, and in disgust allow the practical duties of their offices to pass to these theological amateur favorites of the Legislatures.

True, this government by private societies, supported by private contributions, is claimed to have great advantages, and certainly it has done much good. It is also claimed to be the cheapest by far. Our Police cost millions. Why not, they argue, disband them, and complete the Church Society System? To be consistent, divide up the criminal laws among the sects. Let the Catholics, the Episcopalians, the Methodists, the Presbyterians, the Congregationalists, even the Liberals themselves, have their aliquot share in a general distribution of criminal Law.

In this way the Excelsior State will be relieved of the duties and expenses of government by the kindness and liberality of its religious sects and enthusiasts. The criminal judges will also become superfluous, for these societies, like all theocracies, claim to be infallible. We are told that they never arrest unless "the guilt and the evidence to convict is certain." And even now they have their courts "where they always convict." An accusation by them will mean conviction, ruin, and often death. A police under their control, and a few jailors and executioners, will be the only secular force necessary.

We have stated the facts as they are and as they would logically follow if this system is to be adopted. We respectfully submit that this novelty of government has gone too far already. It is not for the benefit of the state or of religion. We pray for the secularization of the criminal law, and of all connected therewith, as the only safe, impartial, and effective course to pursue.

In this position we stand upon the habits and traditions of the American people since the Revolution, as embodied time and again in their constitutions and the platforms of all of their political parties.

"Keep the church and the state forever separate," said General Grant, for the Republicans at Des Moines, in 1875.

"The separation of church and state for the good of both" is the last campaign watchword of the Democracy.

Let us next see how these admitted principles apply to the bills before you.

IS IT SAFE?

First. We claim that this legislation is not SAFE in theory or practice.

It is not safe in theory, because it is a palpable violation of the fundamental principles of our state and general governments. Our legislators have of late years shown a disposition to brush away all pleas in behalf of liberty and its traditions as so much bunkum. But now our civil war is over. Our government must fail or achieve its success hereafter in developing a people capable of self-government. The policy of all legislation must be judged as it tends to that result. In that point of view our safest and most prudent statesman, President Madison—of all "the Fathers" the least liable to exaggeration—has left us a memorable caution in regard to all questions of liberty in these words:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberty. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The freemen of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much to forget it."

It is readily granted but easily forgotten in practice that our government and laws have their only origin and source of authority from the consent of the governed. Even if it be assumed that a divine sanction underlies all human government, yet the American theory is that this sanction is decisively learned and interpreted through the popular will, and that the voice of the people is the voice of God —vox Populi vox Dei.

Again, we have been taught by precept and example that it is not enough to make a popular government and a "Free America," that the laws should be enacted by representatives of the people, they must also be wholly and fairly and impartially executed by officers of the people directly responsible to them, supported by them, and vested with their authority only.

Upon the two principles above stated the liberties, safety, progress, and general welfare of our people have rested firmly for a hundred years. The Agent of this Society, now present, has in the preface to his book I shall hereafter refer to ignorantly or falsely taunted those whom I represent with promising "a system of government better than the grand institutions of Free America."

No! we promise and ask for nothing better. We are here simply to ask you that you will not permit him and his societies to wilfully or ignorantly undermine "the grand Institutions of Free America." The fundamental principles upon which they rest can have no force or even existence except in a popular Republic where all of the laws are enacted and wholly executed by the people or their direct or responsible officers.

This policy of secular administration of the laws is decidedly violated by this legislation obtained from the state and general governments since 1872 and of which the bill before you is simply one step. It has all been obtained step by step; an inch is given, an ell in taken. That is the usual way in which the liberties of the people in popular governments are in the end lost. If the demand in its whole intent and results should be presented at once you would be astonished at its impudence and give it instant rejection. But it comes so gently, for such good purposes, and from such good and wealthy men, it is so cheap and easy, and effective and innocent in appearance, that the entering-wedge is readily inserted between the people and their government before it is fairly seen to be a wedge at all.

The policy of farming out the criminal laws to irresponsible, amateur, semi-theological societies, once begun, can bring forth, as we have seen, a network of such societies. The existing laws of the States and general government are practically annexed to these societies for execution, and then those laws are increased from year to year.

What is the result? It destroys all confidence in popular government. It is not only a confession that popular government is a failure, but also practical action upon that confession. The aristocracy of wealth and so-called religion are allowed to act upon their favorite postulate that the people cannot be depended upon to repress vice, punish crimes, or enforce the laws, that is, to govern themselvs. Therefore you are besought year by year to let them assume privileges superior to other citizens and to the officers of the people for that purpose. You incorporate them as guardians over the rest of their fellow-citizens to supply or to supplement the failure of the ordinary common law accusation and trial. They are selected only by their co-religionists, responsible only to them or to their churches. They cannot be removed for cause nor defeated in an election nor even impeached. They are the "elect" who are not elected, and yet have and exercise powers of accusation and arrest without warrant that no elected officer has ever dared to ask. They act through their "Agent," not the people's.

Neither are they of the people in sentiment or purpose. They do not and cannot judge from secular and human motives. They act from motives that make them foreigners to a large part of their fellow citizens. The majority of the community who do not attend their churches are regarded by them as the non-elect, as irreclaimable specimens of total depravity, steeped in iniquity—mere tares, whose existence is only to be tolerated until the wheat can be gathered from them, when an eternal-fire torture awaits them. However true this may be as an abstract dogma of theology, the vast majority of the people of this state do not believe in it practically, and only a small fraction of them want to be governed in any way by people who are dominated by this fearful and inhuman bias.

The people of this state, and of the country as a whole, are a pure and a good people because they believe such a life to be scientifically and socially right and becoming, and because they can live better and happier and more usefully in that way than in any other. They don't want to be governed on any theological theory of duty or morals. In a word, they feel that all these quasi-religious, criminal societies, and their government and agents and assumptions, are a direct insult to them.

It is to the majority a return to ecclesiastical law and accusation in their most insidious, dangerous, and detested forms. It is censorship and an inquisition under the law not responsible to the law. It is not the square way of getting out a warrant or an indictment against an offender and breaking up and punishing him by the people, but a return to device and trickery, to decoy and espionage of the post-office, to deceit and crime It is committing crime to punish crime, justified by a Jesuitism that they believed had died with the Inquisition.

They regard it as a farce and a mockery to talk about popular and impartial government where the laws that touch the very hearts and lives of the people are handed over to the agents of such societies for execution.

Every citizen ought to feel, and has a right to feel, that he is equal to every citizen in his responsibility to authorities which are responsible and only responible to him as to every other citizen. He feels that any other policy is contrary to the spirit of the age and to the Constitution in effect if not in its very letter. The clause of that instrument prohibiting the Legislature from granting to "any private corporation, association, or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever," seems to him meaningless unless it can include societies of this kind. Certainly as long as one-half of the fines can go to these societies they have an exclusive privilege. "Equal and exact justice to all men, unequal advantages and privileges to none," is the only safe and constitutional rule of legislation.

This Agent here in your presence and mine has asserted positively that the §7 of the act incorporating his society and which gives it half of the fines inflicted has been repealed. He has also in like manner asserted that his society has never received any part of any fines whatever.

These statements will enable you at once to judge of his capacity for veracity. Neither of the statements is true. That section has not been repealed, and by reference to the subject in the Revised Statutes an amusing piece of this crooked legislation is disclosed in this wise: By an Act (chapter 747) of 1872 he had pretty much everything he could think of declared obscene, etc., and "one-half of said fine to be paid to the informer upon whose evidence the person offending shall be convicted." This clause was in addition to the section 7 of his Act of incorporation, which is to the same effect. So he had it double sure. In 1873 (chapter 777) he had his above Act of 1872 amended by substantially reënacting it and apparently making the fines go to some charitable societies. But by section 3 of this last Act he provides that section 1 of the above Act of 1872, which gives the moiety of the fine to the "informer," shall not be "construed as repealed;" that is, he keeps it in force.

How does this work? When Mrs. Chase was prosecuted her counsel couldn't find out why she was charged under section 1 of the law of 1872 instead 1873. But this milk in the cocoanut solves the mystery. Is it not a pretty piece of trickery for the State of New York to be made a tool of? (See Revised Statutes vol. iii, pp. 979–80, §§ 77–81 and notes.)

That his society has received moieties we have his own positive statements in his book, "Fraud's Exposed."

He says therein, on page 414, that he receives only his salary; but adds, "I have paid over to our treasury more than $6,000 personal fees, MOIETIES, gifts, etc., during the past seven years."

Aside from the utter inconsistency of this statement with the one made before, you reflect that every one of the items he mentions is an element of danger to the public or to individuals.

"Our treasury" means "our society," i. e., practically himself. But what does he mean by personal fees,

MOIETIES,
gifts,
ETC.?

Any one who has anything to do with such things should have nothing to do with the execution of the laws. It is not safe to trust a man who deals in them. The Agent says now that he is willing that that fine clause should be repealed. Take him at his word by all means by passing the bill before you which does it.

Second. But this whole method of enforcing the laws is not safe to individuals. There are abundant instances of wrong, injustice, and crime already committed under it. The Superintendent of our police, and some of his force, have given before you some details of the operations of the agents of this society. They certainly are not details that belong to a fair and honorable administration of the laws. It is an administration in which the unfairness, indecency, cruelty, and outrage leave no practical benefit to the public.

The Agent boasts that he has driven fifteen of his victims to suicide, and many others to ruin and misery. The avowed use of our laws for such purposes is simply hellish. The object of the law is to protect the community by stopping the offenses injurious to it by proper punishments. The offender is then to be saved and reformed if possible, not destroyed. Vengeance, terrorism, ruin, is not the object of the people of the state. But it is the object of this Agent as to those he may deem the enemies of himself, his society, and his God. He follows his man year after year like a sleuth-hound. He tempts and baits and "tests" and decoys. His business is falsehood, his life a crime. The people of the State want a fair, honest, just administration of their laws. They know that it is not safe to employ creatures of this kind. They want no man to lie for them. They know that if he will lie for his God he will lie for himself. False in one, he will be false in all and to all.

That many of his victims have been destroyed by his perjury is directly charged and generally believed. Juries have frequently refused to convict on his evidence. The bill before you to prevent his evidence from being given in courts of justice at all is the best proof of the feeling of insecurity if citizens are to be left with no protection from his conscience and tongue. That bill certainly ought to pass if this Agent's methods of inquisition are not abolished. How unsafe, unjust, cruel, and monstrous many of his proceedings are it would take more time than we have now to detail. Fortunately, some of this work is already done. I hold in my hand a little record of thirty cases, called "Anthony Comstock: His Career of Cruelty and Crime," collected by Mr. D. M. Bennett, one of his victims. This Agent knows the damning nature of his record, and has therefore seen fit to state, in your presence and mine, that this record is a collection of falsehoods prepared or written by an abortionist and would-be murderer, who had made an attempt upon his life.

The Old Christian Spirit.

Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, elected member of Parliament from the borough of Northampton, has been prosecuted by his Christian opponents, and by a Christian judge has been expelled from the House of Commons. The pretext for this movement is because he would not take the prescribed oath, but the solemn affirmation permisable in courts of justice; but the real objection is because he is an Infidel, an Atheist. They could not brook the idea of such an avowed unbeliever being permitted to sit as a lawmaker in the Christian House of Parliament, and to expel him an obsolete statute was dug up which luckily serves their purpose. Mr. Bradlaugh appeals to the House of Lords, but the case will probably not be reached this season.

Here is plainly evinced the same intolerant, bitter, persecuting Christian spirit of which thousands of exhibitions hav been made within the past thousand years. The most they can now do is to unseat him, but could they burn him at the stake gladly would they perform the act. Civilization and the principles of liberty hav progressed too far to allow the burning, but they hav not it seems to declare vacant the seat of a member who was honestly elected by an honest constituency.

When the unjust decision was rendered, Mr. Bradlaugh promptly resigned, and will at once present himself before his constituency for re-election, and, if he is re-elected, proposes to take the regular oath, the omission of which has so greatly troubled his Christian enemies.

Another election takes place in twenty days, and Mr. Bradlaugh will apply himself earnestly to canvassing, assisted by his friend, Labouchere, editor of Truth, and senior member for the same borough. The canvass will doubtless be a very lively one, as the Christian Mr. Varley and others are opposed to him. The utmost religious prejudices and animosities will be aroused, and every means will be employed to defeat him. The result is probably a matter of much doubt. But the public attention drawn to the matter will doubtless help to show the intolerance and meanness of Christian zealots. Whatever the result of the election may be, the efforts made will doubtless strengthen the cause of truth.

It will be regretted if Mr. Bradlaugh is not reelected, as the reforms which he has inaugurated will doubtless languish for the want of his powerful arm to support them. Let us hope that Christian intolerance will not always rule the world.

In the most patient, hopeful, and gentle spirit which we are capable of feeling we earnestly ask our patrons who are in arrears to send what is due us and thereby relieve us of the heavy embarrassment under which we labor. If all our readers would be as prompt in payment as a portion are our pathway in journalism would be much more pleasant than it is and much anxiety and care would be spared us. It is far easier for most of our patrons to pay promptly the small amount due from them than for us to struggle along under a load of debt, without knowing how or whence relief is to come.

Every patron can easily tell when his time expired by noticing the tab on the wrapper. When it has expired we would ask our friends to remit. We would thank such to not keep us waiting too long. It is better to be early in the performance of a duty than to be careless, slow, and dilatory.

A slight error in date occurred in our first page last week. It read April 21 instead of April 2. Types will sometimes get wrong.

Paine Hall Lectures.

The Infidel Pulpit. Lectures of George Chainey, delivered every Sunday afternoon in Paine Memorial Hall. Published by George Chainey, No. 3 Union Park, Boston, Mass.

We hav received numbers 1 and 2 of the above, on "Lessons from the Life and Work of Karl Heinzen," and "Minot Savage's Talks About God." Mr. Chainey seems to hav just got comfortably settled in his new home, and sends these out to those who are unable to attend his lectures. Our readers do not need to be told that he is able and eloquent, for they hav had some of his lectures laid before them in these columns. The two lectures before us are full of beauty and pathos, underneath which run a convincing logic and clear insight into theological superstitions. Minot Savage's brilliant ability does not prevent Mr. Chainey from scoring the absurdity of the Unitarian position—neither fish, flesh, nor fowl—a position he himself has just left for a more tenable one; and the beauty of Karl Heinzen's life and work fills him with a tender admiration of the man.

Wanting all the world for his parish, Mr. Chainey prints his weekly sermons in a neat pamphlet of from nine to twelve pages and mails them for $1 per year, or 5 cents per number. If any particular lecture is wanted to circulate he will furnish them at very low rates.

These two first discourses are very fine, and we commend them to our friends.

Miscellaneous.

One Day to Liberalism.

To accomplish any great work there must be concert of action. Therefore allow me to suggest that every subscriber to The Truth Seeker devote the 1st of May next to obtaining subscribers for this most valuable publication. If there are those who cannot spare the time, let them employ some one to do the work for them. Remember the time, May 1, 1881. Great results hav been accomplished by efforts.

Atheism.

"What charm has Atheism for the hungry, the naked, the friendless, the oppressed?" asks the Brooklyn Eagle. Well, it didn't propose to feed them on diseased meat, or Ezekiel's appetizing repast; it has not thought of supplying the lack of clothing by enveloping them in the flames of an eternal roasting-pit; it is to be presumed that they hav had enough of the friendship of a God who has let them suffer every conceivable agony in this earth, and as for oppression they know that the church has in God's name blessed every chain forged for the limbs of earth's unhappy children. The idea of a secular journalist talking of the "comfort" to be derived from the faith in a gold-paved city off in the realm of nowhere! Of what is the man dreaming? Does he not know that this is an age of science, not of vain divings after the unfathomable, reaching after the unexisting, and grasping at the unattainable.

[From the Seymour Times.]

Conclusiv or Inconclusiv; Which?

BY. W. H. BURR.

In the Times of Feb. 19th, Mr. Underwood said:

"'Junius Unmasked' is, in my opinion, a weak performance. The essay by Prof. Denslow is, to my mind, quite conclusive; and from conversation with him I learn that he does not hold very strongly to the opinion—which I think he hastily formed—that Paine wrote or had any connection with Junius's letters. And the articles from the pen of Mr. Burr hav not, I think, given one fact that goes to show that Paine wrote those letters."

In the Times of March 19th, four weeks later, he says:

"I wrote or intended to write, 'The essay of Mr. Denslow is, to my mind, quite inconclusiv.' . . . If Mr. Burr had considered the whole sentence [see it above] together with my known rejection of Denslow's conclusions [!] he hardly could hav taken advantage of this error [!!] in two numbers of the Times before it was possible for me to correct it." [!!!]

Mr. Underwood's article containing the alleged error reached me on the day of publication, Feb. 19th, and must hav reached him at Springfield, Ill., at least as early. But his article dated at that place Feb. 20th, in rejoinder to one of mine on the Declaration of Independence, contained no correction of the alleged error.

In the Times of Feb. 26th I quoted the first part of the sentence containing the alleged error, and most of my article was a refutation of it as it stood.

That refutation must hav reached Mr. Underwood at Thorndike, Mass., by the 28th, the date of his article correcting the alleged error. How unfortunate that he did not discover it until I had exposed the self-stultifying fallacy of the statement! And how lamentable that his letter of Feb. 28th was so long in getting to Seymour! It did not appear till March 19th, simultaneously with another dated March 8th, on a kindred subject, and containing likewise a correction of the same alleged error. The later letter, furthermore, was announced the week before, but nothing was said in advance about the earlier one! The delay of the letter of Feb. 28th is certainly a great mystery, and so is the fact that the writer did not discover so important an error until I had made a most damning exposure of the fallacy of the statement as it stood, and published a second exposure the following week not only in the Times but in the Investigator, The Truth Seeker meanwhile having copied the first exposure from the Times.

And now my adversary not only repeats that "'Junius Unmasked' is a weak performance," but says that Prof. Denslow's essays are just as weak, and that neither the Chicago editor nor I nor anybody else "has adduced any evidence whatever that Junius was Paine!" What will his friend Denslow think of that? I certainly consider the Professor as a man of great ability, and so does Col. Ingersoll. I wish I could say as much of my opponent.

It is only superficial readers who think they discover facts incompatible with the identity of Paine and Junius. Prof. Denslow, one of the best informed on this question, could discover only one, and that he has since given up, Col. Ingersoll only three more, which I completely refuted; but Mr. Underwood will no doubt go on to discover them ad libitum, every one of which has been answered already in "Junius Unmasked" or in the Liberal papers.

But let me answer them again. Junius did say in his first private letter to his publisher, April 12, 1769, "My rank and fortune place me above a common bribe." It was a clever bit of finesse, intended to hoodwink Woodfall by making him think Junius was not a man of humble station. It was never intended for the public eye, but Woodfall printed it, nevertheless. It is not in the authorized edition. Nor was Philip Francis a man of "rank and fortune" in 1769; he was a mere clerk in the war office, twenty-nine years of age, and the son of a chaplain and tutor.

If Trevelyan said it was another than his uncle Macaulay who set the Junius controversy forever at rest, I must hav been misled by the reviewer in the Nation, who ridiculed the assertion, as it deserves to be.

It is disingenuous to charge me with misleading Mr. Underwood in regard to the alleged statement of Benjamin Franklin. Not having time at once to verify or disprove the statement, I neither admitted nor denied it, but argued that if Franklin ever had to say anything he would be likely to finesse about it, knowing that Paine was the author of the Declaration. Most of the labor imposed upon me by my opponents is the correction of their many blunders.

And now after dogmatically asserting that Theodore Parker believed Jefferson wrote the Declaration, and presuming that Daniel Webster did so, too, Mr. Underwood coolly calls upon me to go and search their writings to prove that they did not believe it. My time is too valuable to be thus wasted.

Mr. Underwood says Mr. Burr knows that Paine's anonymous charges against Deane were true. No, I don't. Nine years ago a very intelligent old Freethinker maintained to me that Deane was an innocent man, as he had ascertained from an examination of the case. Most of the charges brought by Junius were true, and it is a slander to accuse him of lying. Not being within the circle of the well informed, as Mr. Denslow now admits, how could he help making some mistakes, based on misinformation or false report, just as many of his critics hav made mistakes about him? I stand ready to vindicate the moral rectitude and stern integrity of Junius.

That Junius doubted the practicability of a republican government in England is true. But just here comes in another of the many strong evidences of the identity of Paine and Junius. In the very next year after Junius completed his work Paine's views of monarchy began to undergo a change from hearing the remark that "Frederick of Prussia was the best fellow in the world for a king, because he had so much of the devil in him." Junius regarded the British constitution as substantially republican, and for an indirect attack on royalty his publisher was indicted, tried, and convicted. It was more than a year after Paine's arrival in America before he ventured to assail hereditary succession, and even then "his invectivs against monarchy," says his biographer, Cheetham, "were intended against the monarchy of England rather than against monarchy in general."

That Woodfall did disclose some of the secrets of Junius is evident from the private letters, and among those disclosures appears to hav been the fact that Junius would write no more. Junius suspected the actor Garrick of telling it, as appears from numbers 41 and 43, more than two months before the last letter was published.

There is no discrepancy in the sentiments of Junius and Paine about the treatment of the colonies except so far as Paine's views may hav been modified after coming to America, just as he modified his views of monarchy and the British army. No reliance is to be placed on the miscellaneous letters first published in 1812 and attributed to Junius. Most of them are spurious, including probably the one Mr. Underwood quotes. It is on these unauthenticated letters that the claim on behalf of Philip Francis almost entirely rests. They hav misled multitudes, including Prof. Denslow, who in them alone finds evidence of scurrility and blackguardism, which he mistakenly attributes to Junius.

The claim on behalf of Philip Francis is entirely baseless. When in 1816 a friend wanted him to say whether he was Junius he answered by letter denouncing the report as "a silly, malignant falsehood." And the learned Dr. Parr scouted the report, saying, "No, sir; Francis did not write those letters; he is too brave to fear disclosure, and too vain to keep it to himself."

And now once more in regard to the alleged error which Mr. Underwood was so very tardy in correcting, I feel constrained to say, after a careful consideration of all the facts, that further and more positiv or circumstantial evidence is needed to convince me that he did make an error. And as the case now stands I think that a justice who should hav it to decide would be likely to render his decision after the manner of the Dutch miller who arraigned and tried himself for taking a little too much toll. "Henry Schneider," said he, "you may go on de right hant mit de sheeps; but it ish a tam tight squeezh."

JUNIUS AND WOODFALL.

How the humble exciseman, Junius, fulfilled his promis to reimburse his publisher in case of prosecution for libel.

THE PROMIS.

Aug. 6, 1769.

For the matter of assistance be assured that, if a question should arise upon any writings of mine, you shall not want it. You see how things go, and I fear my assistance would not avail you much. . . . My own works you shall constantly hav, and in point of money be assured you never shall suffer.

Aug. 16, 1769.

Avoid prosecutions if you can, but above all things avoid the Houses of Parliament—there is no contending with them. At present you are safe, for this House of Commons has lost all dignity, and dare not do anything.

Beginning of Feb., 1770.

If your affair should come to a trial, and you should be found guilty, you will let me know what expense falls particularly on yourself; for I understand you are engaged with other proprietors. Some way or other you shall be reimbursed.

THE FULFILMENT.

Feb. 21, 1771.

You may rely upon it the ministry are sick of prosecutions. Those against Junius cost the treasury above six thousand pounds, and after all they got nothing but disgrace. . . . A little expense is not to be regarded, and I hope these papers hav reimbursed you. I never will send you anything that I think dangerous, but the risque is yours.

March 5, 1772.

What you say about the profits [on the book which Woodfall offered to divide with Junius] is very handsome. As for myself, be assured that I am far above all pecuniary views, and no other person, I think, has any claim to share with you.

Preface to Book.

I giv to Mr. Henry Sampson Woodfall, and to him alone, my right, interest, and property in these letters.

MRS. MARGARET CHAPPELLSMITH ON JUNIUS.

Letter to W. H. Burr.

Dec. 31, 1874.

I hav not yet learned to believe that Paine was Junius, but I note the ingenuity of some of your arguments. I hav a higher respect for Paine than for Junius, though if Paiue were the author of the brilliant letters of Junius, that would not diminish my respect for him.

Letter to B. F. Underwood recently.

Five [six] years ago I told Mr. Burr that I did not believe Paine to be the author of the letters, and that my esteem for Paine would not be increased by believing that he was the writer of those letters.

The above extracts, to be sure, are not quite contradictory; but only show that if Paine was Junius it would neither diminish nor increase her respect and esteem for Paine. Very good.

Mistakes.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

There are the mistakes of Moses, and there are other mistakes. Sometimes Liberals make mistakes, but when they do they should hasten at once to correct them. I hav made a mistake. I wrote The Truth Seeker last week that I had found one Liberal Presbyterian. It is a mistake; I havn't found him. He is like the Irishman's flea, "he isn't there."

This is the way it was. The proprietor of the leading journal of Binghamton said he would print a synopsis of my lecture. He wished to treat all classes alike. The synopsis was prepared. It was sent to the office. It did not appear. The writer called. An explanation was proffered. The gentleman could not publish it because it was an attack upon Christianity, which was sacred to the people. It ridiculed Christianity; he could not admit it. "What, not as a matter of news?" "No. There were things which transpired in the rear of society which he would not publish even as news. It demoralized the people. So would utterances like these, to wit: 'God pays no taxes on his houses of worship. Christianity pinches the poor to propitiate an angry Jehovah.'" "Ah! so your paper will print but one side of a story? I consider Christianity demoralizing to the community. You do not agree with me, therefore you exclude my report. Had I known that your paper was not a secular paper, I should not hav proffered the synopsis."

This is the substance of my interview with the gentleman who hoped he was no bigot, the Presbyterian whom I wanted to immortalize. My laudable effort is defeated. I hav made a greater mistake than Moses. I mistook a bigot for a Liberal.

I observed that during this interview, in his discovery of my Infidelity, he had forgotten good manners. He sat, but offered me no seat. I intended to hav bidden him good morning. He invited no such courtesy. Because we entertained different views upon religion, the civilities of life were overlooked. Humanity was extinguished by Christianity. Alas for the world! Alas for truth when she must fight for her life! Alas for justice while churches rule the land! With redoubled vigor let us prosecute our work. Let us rest not night nor day till the statute books of the land proclaim this country free in fact, as poetry and song hav loved to paint her.

The grandest nation on the earth, with resources unsurpassed, with climate unrivaled, with beauty bewildering, with people gathered from every quarter of the globe—what! leave her in the toils of superstition? Consign the children of heroic sires to slavery? No; close up the ranks, ring out the olden watchward, "Liberty or death!" and march to certain victory.

Hammond and The Infidels.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Mr. Hammond, the noted revivalist, has been engaged recently in Toronto in his professional work of "saving souls." The revivalist has, it seems, waxed valiant of late, and actually invited or challenged the representativs of the Toronto Liberal Association to come to his meeting and take the platform and he would guarantee them a hearing. Of course the Freethinkers were not slow in accepting this friendly token, and Mr. W. B. Cooke, Vice-President of the Association, put in an appearance on the platform the next evening, with many of the brethren among the audience in the body of Shaftesbury Hall, which was literally packed in every corner. The Evening Telegram of the 16th inst. givs a lengthy report of what took place, with the following heading: "Orthodoxy vs. Heterodoxy. The old, old story found fault with. Freethought at a revival meeting. A scene never before beheld in Toronto."

It seems that some of the city clergy had found fault with Mr. Hammond for having extended the invitation to the Freethinkers, stating that "the meetings were held for the purpose of proclaiming the gospel, and not for the purpose of affording skeptics an opportunity to criticise it." The evangelist, however, announced that as the invitation had been given, he was not "going back on his word," and that Mr. Cooke should be heard; that he had arranged with him that he should hav ten minutes in which to speak. Mr. Cooke then came forward, and the Telegram givs the following account of his speech:

"I say, friends, that no one should be afraid or ashamed to make known his honest thoughts on any subject. No good can be accomplished by the concealment of thought. The most deadly sin is that of hypocrisy, and the chaining of thought tends to hypocrisy. I can see no merit or demerit in believing or disbelieving per se, but theology holds the contrary. As an Infidel I hate the word as it is applied in malice, for like the word heretic it was invented by a dominant church as a term of opprobrium. According to the Roman Catholic church, Mr. Hammond himself is a heretic.

"We hav all of us an equal interest in this matter, an Infidel as much as Mr. Hammond or any one else. If I hav a soul to save I want to know it, and I want to know the truth just as much as any one else. To come to the point. Is Christian teaching identical with the theology of the churches? The ground-work of all the churches is based on inspiration of the Bible, but if that book is inspired, what about its interpretation? If we are to believe the Bible, which one is it to be—the Douay translation or King James's version, or hav we to wait for the new version from the Jerusalem chamber? Inspiration can only be contained in one of three forms, viz: in the separate letters or gospels as written, in the manuscripts as collated, or in the translations as printed. Hav they in any of these forms an authoritativ interpretation? If inspiration is proved, where is the authoritativ interpretation? No two churches agree on interpretation if they agree on inspiration. Again, translations differ. These differences cannot be reconciled. The translations vary considerably. In the Douay Bible Job's wife is made to say 'bless God and die,' in the orthodox version, 'curse God and die.' Now if 'bless' and 'curse' are interchangeable terms, the difficulties of understanding are multiplied. The Bishop of Montreal has so little faith in the Protestant Bible that he has recently said that it is a sin to swear a Roman Catholic upon it. There are again various theories of the atonement. The Unitarian church holds that Christ did not die to reconcile God to the world, but the world to God. The Broad Anglican Church holds the same theory. I am asked to believe in Christ; but what am I to believe about him? Am I to believe that he had no human father, but two human grandfathers? Read the genealogies of Matthew and Luke, and such is the case. If I don't believe this am I to be condemned to everlasting torture?"

Mr. Cooke then referred to the young man, as reported in the Telegram of yesterday, who had renounced Infidelity. He also spoke about the declining belief in a personal devil and a literal hell. As to a future life he said he could not conceive the possibility of continuing consciousness apart from the conditions of consciousness, and that he believed that if there was a judgment day, it was of more importance what we did than what we believed. During his remarks Mr. Cooke spoke with great courtesy, never using a word that the most fastidious could construe as blasphemous. One middle-aged man, with an everlasting simper on his face, cried "time" twice, but Mr. Hammond paid no attention to his ill-bred interruption, and allowed the speaker five minutes over his time.

Mr. Hammond then commenced his reply. After some preliminaries he said (according to the Telegram's report) that it was impossible to answer all that had been said by the previous speaker in one evening, but as the divinity of Christ had been denied, he would confine himself to that. He then invited the congregation to accompany him in imagination to Jerusalem. What did they see? Three men on crosses and a great crowd looking on. Who were those men? That was the great question. Two of them they knew to be common thieves, but what about the third? Listen to what the crowd says. It calls him an impostor, a felon, and a sinner. But a young man called Lazarus says that he was dead, and that that impostor brought him to life again. Could a man do that? He (Mr. Hammond) wouldn't say that was the son of God, for Mr. Cooke might reply that wasn't fair, and that he was begging the question. He left it to the countless number whom Christ had healed to say whether he was divine or not. What did he say himself upon that cross when dying, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Could an impostor raise dead men to life and open blind men's eyes? Never. Ask Peter, that once-swearing man, who Christ is. Read every chapter in the gospel of St. John, and again ask the question. Mr. Hammond spoke for somewhat over sixty minutes in reply to Mr. Cooke, and concluded an earnest address by a strong appeal for Christianity. Shortly afterward the vast crowd slowly left the building, the choir singing hymn after hymn as it did so. At the meeting of the preceding evening, after the invitation had been extended to the Infidels, Mr. Hammond said that the invitation was extended because he desired to prove them on the wrong path. When in Washington he had extended an invitation to the President of the Infidel Association there. The invitation had been accepted, and the result was that the Washington Association had been broken up, the Secretary being now engaged in Christian work. The name of that secretary was P. C. Cheeks, and he hoped if there was any Infidel present who doubted what he said, that he would write to Washington and enquire for himself if what he said was not true. Can you tell us, Mr. Editor, whether this story is true or not? Your correspondent, W. H. Burr, Esq., of Washington, would doubtless know. Will Mr. B. kindly let us hear from him. This new departure of the great revivalist will of course be hailed by us with delight. We are very thankful for even ten minutes on a revival platform before a Christian audience. Mr. Hammond is evidently under the influence of our evolution, and is making a slight advance forward. So mote it be! Amen!

Yours very truly, Allen Pringle.

Notes by the Way.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

About two months ago my name was placed in the columns of your paper as one of its special agent, and since that time I hav visited about twenty towns and villages in southern Michigan in the interest of Freethought and reform, and hav taken one hundred trial subscribers for The Truth Seeker and some renewals.

In view of the deeply interesting matter which is presented weekly in the columns of the paper, and the immensely important interests constantly under discussion in its pages, I trust a large proportion of those who hav subscribed temporarily for The Truth Seeker will become permanent patrons. Very many persons say the paper is becoming more and still more interesting week by week.

Grace L. Parkhurst appears in the last number of the paper with an excellent article bearing upon the national issues in the balance, and givs expression to her thoughts about the contemplated trip around the world. In my judgment her views are well worthy of thoughtful consideration. I hope Mrs. Parkhurst, of Ohio; Elvira Wheelock, of Wis; Mrs. Slenker, of Va., and a host of other good and strong women, will continue to put an earnest hand to the pen and thus contribute to make The Truth Seeker the most attractiv journal of the age.

Since my last correspondence with The Truth Seeker I hav visited Centreville, Newburg, Dowagiac, Kalamazoo, Galesburgh, Augusta, and Battle Creek. I could giv many items of special interest from each of these places, but I fear my article would become too lengthy.

My next tour will be to Jonesville, Hillsdale, Coldwater, Three Rivers, and so on. I hope the places I may visit in the future will do as well by me in my efforts to extend the best interests of reform, by extending the circulation of your paper, as the people hav done in the places I hav already visited. My acquaintance with the people has been very pleasant indeed, and I hope renewed calls will increase in interest.

Fraternally yours, C. S. Rowley.

Discussion.

What Objections to Christianity?

MR. MAIR'S EIGHTH LETTER.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We must agree that our readers have sufficient critical acumen to detect me when I fail to grasp your meaning or realize the weight of your proof; or if I should be so unfortunate as to misrepresent you they will undoubtedly feel justly indignant, and your argument will lose none of its strength. And I may presume the same of their impartiality toward myself.

I am profoundly impressed with the conviction that there is a great moral distinction between the miracles of Christ and those of the apocryphal gospels and other sources, because the former have to be caricatured before the distinction can be lost. I am sorry that you do not perceive the difference, because I think it exhibits a sad triumph of bias over dispassionate judgment.

The same remark might also be made in reference to the manner in which you have slurred over the prophecies I have quoted. One might call it a failure honestly to read them, since what I have applied to John the Baptist you have criticised as if applied to Christ. Your prefatory remarks about the original meaning of prophecy sound suspiciously like Mr. Paine's, although I must give you credit for characterizing them in language less offensive to Christian ears than does that delicate writer. But I hope to take up the subject of prophecy at a future time, so I shall dismiss the subject for the present after reminding you that one of those prophecies which I quoted (Isaiah liii) by its lucidity and exact application to Christ overcame the Infidelity and lifelong love of sin in the person of no less a man than the witty and profligate Lord Rochester; and even Prof. F. W. Newman admits, after a labored attempt to explain them away, that "it still remained strange that there should be coincidences so close with the sufferings of Jesus foretold in it" (Phases of Faith, p. 197).

The "intelligent Hebrew" who happened so opportunely to be at your service to give you an "assurance" on the strength of which to contradict my reference to the Talmud is, I judge, scarcely so reliable an authority as the former Rabbi J. S. C. F. Frey, the author of a Hebrew grammar, a Hebrew, Latin, and English dictionary, editor of Vander Hooght's Hebrew Bible, etc., etc. He says, after quoting most of the prominent facts in the life of Christ, which are referred to in the Toldoth Jeshu (which was probably at one time a portion of the Talmud) and the Hebrew book Machril, "But these facts do not rest upon the Toldoth Jeshu and the Machril only; passages to the same effect are now to be found in both the Babylonish and the Jerusalem Talmuds, Vide Sanhedrim, Sabbath Avodah, Sarah, Masachteth Kallah, Sota Gittin, Zeror Hammor, and many other Jewish writings" (Judah and Benj. vol. i, page 214).

Before entering upon the third proposition I desire to rectify some mistakes you have made in your remarks about the revised translation of the New Testament. I think them perhaps profitable to correct, because I have seen several erroneous statements made about the "new version," as it is called in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it may also save similar errors in our future theses. Those who state that there are thirty-two thousand different versions of the New Testament have no knowledge of the effect of ciphers placed on the right, and no regard for truth. Neither are there "fearful errors" in our present translation—not one "fearful" error. If the present revisers have expurgated the word hell, they have not in the slightest altered the teaching of scripture on the eternal punishment of the wicked, for that truth is not derived from a word. The Greek word hades means under-world, the place of departed spirits, whether in heaven or hell; it is the context which proves the locality. We have it upon the authority of the revisers themselves, or those authorized to speak for them, that there will not be a single fundamental difference between the old and the new translations. The English language has undergone great changes since 1611, and it is desirable that the word of God be translated into the language of to-day, not of nearly three centuries back. What objection to the Bible an honest critic can find from this when explained is more than I can imagine.

The elegant though Infidel historian Gibbon says: "The authentic histories of the actions of Christ were composed in the Greek language after the Gentile converts were grown extremely numerous. As soon as those histories were translated into the Latin tongue, they were perfectly intelligible to all the subjects of Rome, excepting only to the peasants of Syria and Egypt, for whose benefit particular versions were afterward made. The public highways which had been constructed for the use of the legions opened an easy passage for the Christian missionaries from Damascus to Corinth, and from Italy to the extremity of Spain or Britain. There is the strongest reason to believe that, before the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine, the faith of Christ had been preached in every province and in all the great cities of the empire. The rich provinces that extend from the Euphrates to the Ionian sea were the principal theater on which the apostle of the Gentiles displayed his zeal and piety. The seeds of the gospel which he had scattered in a fertile soil were diligently cultivated by his disciples; and it should seem that during the first two centuries the most considerable body of Christians was contained within those limits. Among the societies which were instituted in Syria none were more ancient or illustrious than those of Damascus, of Berea or Alleppo, and of Antioch. The prophetic introduction of the apocalypse has described and immortalized the seven churches of Asia, Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Laodicea, and Philadelphia, and their colonies were soon diffused over that populous country. In a very early period the islands of Cyprus and Crete, the provinces of Thrace and Macedonia, gave a favorable reception to the new religion, and Christian republics were soon founded in the cities of Corinth, of Sparta, and of Athens. To these domestic testimonies we may add the confession, the complaints, and the apprehensions of the Gentiles themselves. From the writings of Lucian, a philosopher who had studied mankind and who describes their manners in the most lively colors, we may learn that under the reign of Commodus, his native country of Pontius was filled with Epicureans and Christians. Within fourscore years after the death of Christ the humane Pliny laments the magnitude of the evil which he vainly attempted to eradicate. In his very curious epistle to the Emperor Trajan he affirms that the temples were almost deserted, that the sacred victims scarcely found any purchasers, and that superstition had not only infected the cities but had ever spread itself into the villages and the open country of Pontus and Cithynia" (Gibbon vol. ii, chapter xv., pp. 357-360).

Such is the animated description by an author whose freedom from partiality toward Christianity none will deny, of the rapid spread of its doctrines, and this nearly a century before the time of Irenæus, whom you charge with being the probable originator of the four gospels. Can you persuade yourself that it was a possible thing that if there had not been in existence before his time the four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, he could palm them off on such a vast, varied, and critical assembly? For philosophers, senators, and men of rank and wealth, as well as the poor and illiterate, had embraced the doctrines of Christ in every part of the known world. Is it credible, in your judgment, that if before Irenæus they had never heard of or known the gospels in our New Testament, they would have received these and rejected others as spurious? There never was the slightest suspicion that these were not genuine, even by the opponents of Christianity. The Jews, Celsus, Lucian, Porphyry, Eunomius, Hierocles, never alleged that they were spurious, although they could have easily proved it if it were so, and although the proof would have been more disastrous to the faith of Christ than any other charge. The incredibility and impossibility of the charge is so great and so apparent to any one who investigates the circumstances that however honest you may be in your opinion, I am confirmed in my belief that were it not for the intense hatred of the human heart to the pure, though humbling, doctrines of the New Testament, the assertion that the gospels are not genuine would be dismissed as absurd, and, in fact, never would have been made. The transparent simplicity of Infidel faith in this regard is truly wonderful.

Why should you make such a charge against Irenæus? What are the facts upon which you base it? It is, in my opinion, a very discreditable thing to any cause if its support involves slanders against good men that are absolutely baseless, and I apprehend that you can obtain no further proof of this one than that you wish it were so, for it would afford a seeming plausibility to your argument. Hence until you prove that Irenæus was an unreliable and dishonest controversialist, the fact must remain very damaging to your argument that the man who was a disciple of a disciple of the apostle John, the writer of the fourth gospel, and who conversed with many who had personally known the apostles of the Lord, speaks of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and of the New Testament, exactly as Christians do in the churches to-day, accrediting them to the same writers, and deriving from them the same fundamental doctrines.

You allege Mosheim to prove that "it was a habit of the early Chsistians to attach great names to their writings in order to cover their want of merit or truth." But, as Paley observed, there was certainly very little eminence attached to Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Very little is said of Matthew, and that little would make him intensely objectionable to the Jews; the gospels never mention Mark or Luke, and neither of them, either in the Acts or Paul's epistles, are praised, but rather the reverse.

You acknowledge that the four gospels were in existence at the time of Irenæus credited respectively to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and that he distinctly asserts it. I would like to copy his remarks. "We hav not received," he says, "the knowledge of the way of our salvation by any others than those by whom the gospel has been brought to us, which gospel they first preached, and afterwards by the will of God committed to writing, that it might be for time to come the foundation and pillar of our faith. For after that our Lord arose from the dead, and they (the apostles) were endowed from above with the power of the Holy Ghost coming down upon them they received a perfect knowledge of all things. They then went forth to all the ends of the earth, declaring to men the blessing of heavenly peace, having all of them and every one alike the gospel of God. Matthew, then among the Jews, wrote a gospel in their own language, while Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel at Rome and founding a church there; and after their exit, Mark, also the disciple and interpreter of Peter, delivered to us in writing the things that had been preached by Peter; and Luke, the companion of Paul, put down in a book the gospel preached by him. Afterwards John, the disciple of the Lord, who also leaned upon his breast, he likewise published a gospel while he dwelt at Ephesus in Asia." If, as you assert, this was the origin of the four gospels, how comes it that the upholders of the heresies, against whom Irenæus was so victoriously writing, did not immediately contradict him and expose that the four gospels came from former gospels, which, you say, Irenæus modified to form the present ones? They well knew that it would only expose them to ridicule to attempt denying the genuineness of the canonical histories.

In your list at which I glanced in the conclusion of my last letter you group among others Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Polycarp, Ignatius, Papias, Hegesippus, Justin, and Melito as knowing nothing of the four gospels. How do they happen to quote from them? Translations of the remains of all of the above are preserved in the antenicene Library, a copy of which the reader may see in any public library. In quoting scripture, as was the general habit of the earliest Christians, they made no reference to the books, generally preceding the quotation as Paul does by the words, "It is written." Thus Barnabas quotes Matt. xx, 16, "Let us therefore beware lest it come upon us, as it is written, Many are called but few chosen." In a hasty glance I also noticed quotations from Mark and Luke which I have not preserved.

Clement was a companion of Paul, who refers to him in Phil. iv., 3, "with Clement also, and others my fellow-laborers." In his epistle to the Corinthian church he quotes many sentences found in our gospels, as I noticed in his second epistle to the Corinthians; chapter ii quotes Matthew and Luke; chapter iii, Matthew x, 32; chapter iv, Matthew xxii, 37; and many others, prefacing them as "Remembering the words of the Lord Jesus." He also by name refers to "the epistle of the blessed apostle Paul," written to that church. In the same manner Hermas quotes from Matthew, Luke, and John.

Polycarp also, in his epistle to the Philipians, quotes Matthew and Luke, introducing the quotations by "being mindful of what the Lord said in his teaching," and he refers by name to many of Paul's epistles—Philipians, Corinthians, Ephesians, Gallatians, etc. (chap. iii). In one place he says, "I trust that ye are well exercised in the holy scriptures, as in these scriptures it is said, Be ye angry and sin not; let not the sun go down on your wrath," which is found in the New Testament in Eph. iv, 26; and in another he says, "Whoever perverts the oracles of the Lord to his own lusts and says there is neither resurrection nor judgment, he is the first-born of Satan." Remember that this man was the teacher of Irenæus, whose testimony is as direct and pointed as anything that could be written on the subject.

The next whom you adduce as being ignorant of the four gospels is Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, being called to that office about forty years after Christ's ascension, and of whom tradition says he was one of the little children on which Christ placed his hands. He makes unacknowledged quotations from Matthew and John, refers to Paul, and quotes the epistles to the Ephesians by name. He also speaks of "fleeing to the gospel as the flesh of Jesus and to the apostles as the presbytery of the church;" and again, "But the gospel has somewhat in it more excellent, the appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ, his passion and resurrection;" and again, "Ye ought to hearken to the prophets, but especially the gospel in which the passion has been manifested to us, and the resurrection perfected." We speak nowadays of the law and the prophets, true as gospel, etc., by which we class together the five books of Moses as the law, the several books of the Old Testament prophecy as the prophets, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John as the gospel. Ignatius evidently has the same meaning, and other writings very little later than his time prove the application.

"Neither did Papias," you say, but surely in this you are unfortunate. In the fragments of his writings which have been preserved to us I found the words, "Four Marys may be found in the gospel" (Fragment X., Antenicene Library). In another place he writes, "And John the presbyter also said this, Mark being the interpreter of Peter, whatsoever he recorded he wrote with great accuracy, but not, however, in the order in which it was spoken or done by our Lord, for he neither heard nor followed our Lord, but, as before said, he was in company with Peter, who gave him such instruction as was necessary, but not to give a history of our Lord's discourses: wherefore Mark has not erred in anything by writing some things as he has recorded them, for he was carefully attentive to one thing, not to pass by anything that he heard, or to state anything falsely in these accounts." Of Matthew he states (upon what authority I know not), "Matthew composed his history in the Hebrew dialect, and every one translated it as he was able." This conclusively refutes the assertion that Papias knew neither of Matthew or Mark, and I have no doubt but that, if we had all his writings, they would bring refutation to many statements which are now safely made in their absence.

After adducing Quadratus and Aristides you conclude with Hegesippus, Justin Martyr, and Melito. Hegesippus was a converted Jew, who traveled from Palestine to Rome and relates that "in every succession, and in every city, the same doctrine is taught which the law, and the prophets and the Lord teacheth," plainly meaning writings or histories about Christ. Hegesippus also refers to the history in the second chapter of Matthew, but of him as with Papias the merest fragment has escaped destruction.

Justin Martyr's works are replete with quotations from the gospels; in fact, as Paley has said, a complete life of Christ might be composed from the quotations he makes. Thus, "And then when Jesus came to the river Jordan, where John was baptizing, as Jesus descended into the water a fire also was kindled in Jordan; and when he came up out of the water, the apostles of this our Christ have written that the Holy Ghost lighted upon him as a dove;" and, "For the apostles in the memoirs composed by them, which are called gospels, have thus delivered it, that Jesus commanded them to take bread and give thanks." And in his apology to the emperor he describes a portion of worship in a Christian assembly in these words, "The memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read according as the time allows, and when the reader has ended, the president makes a discourse, exhorting to the imitation of so excellent things."

I might include in this connection a writer whom you have omitted, Tatian, the pupil of Justin Martyr, who composed a harmony of the four gospels, calling it the gospel by the four, in Greek the Diatessaron. The pupil certainly knew of the four gospels if the master did not.

And lastly, Melito. Melito was quite a voluminous writer, but he is represented now by only a few detached sentences. One of his works was a treatise on the Revelation of John. Indeed he is thought by some to have been the "angel" of the church at Sardis referred to in that book. You have quoted from him yourself; had you gone a page further on in Eusebius you would have seen sufficient to have convinced you that Melito knew of the New Testament, the complete book, not merely the gospels. In a letter to his friend Onesimus he sends a carefully prepared catalogue of the Old Testament; if there was an Old Testament there must have been a New Testament from which it was distinguished (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., p. 164).

I cannot but think that I have given under the circumstances what amounts to a conclusive proof that the gospels Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, as we have them, are translations of originals as old as Christianity and rightly credited to the writers whose names they bear. And not only are they thus constantly referred to by orthodox Christians, but from Cerinthus, the contemporary of the apostle John, downward every heretic of the primitive church referred to them as authoritative and genuine writings.

Those who are familiar with the Hebrew and Greek assert that it is a moral impossibility that any of the Christian Fathers could have written the gospels on account of the style of the writers. The numerous Hebraisms in them prove that they were written by men of Jewish birth, and they are as unlike the writings of Irenæus as the style of Pope is unlike that of Cowper. I scarcely need pursue this line of proof further; you cannot but realize that it is of great weight.

But it does not need an elaborate historical examination to determine whether the gospels are the word of God. The soul that is anxious to find him is being as eagerly sought by the ever-living Savior. To such a soul the gospels have a proof and evidential value above what learning or research can exhibit; they prove themselves the word and truth of God as the sun proves itself his handiwork—by their own light. The book which, first awakening me from the careless indifference to the realization of my lost state, is made through the influence of the spirit of God to be the means of acquaintance with the Redeemer, and salvation through him, cannot be false. And when I know myself, the former slave of sin, delivered from it through his merits, the book that has been the instrument of this blessed revelation of God deserves my whole undoubting trust.

You have in a previous letter made a quotation from the edition of the apocryphal New Testament, published by William Hone, Ludgate Hill, London. Do you recall the story of William Hone and the result of this publibation? He was, sir, your prototype, for thirty years an Atheist, and he published this edition of the apocryphal New Testament for the same purpose that you keep it on your shelves—to discredit the true. Yet he, by the rich grace of the long-suffering God, was privileged to bear this witness: "When I found what an outcry there was against me on account of the apocryphal gospels, I set to work to read the canonical gospels, and oh what a flood of light burst upon me! And thus I became a convert to Christianity from conviction." On the fly-leaf of his Bible he wrote:

"The proudest heart that ever beat
Hath been subdued in me;
The wildest will that ever rose
To scorn thy word or aid thy foes
Is quelled, my God, by thee.

Thy will, and not my will, be done,
My heart be ever thine!
Confessing thee the mighty 'Word,'
I hail thee, Christ, my God, my Lord,
And make thy name my sign!"

But I fear I am making this letter too long; so as I have replied to such portions of the third thesis as you have taken up, I will draw my remarks to a close.

Very sincerely yours, G. M. MAIR.

Judge Comegys to the Bar!

Chief-Justice Joseph P. Comegys, Dover, Delaware,

MY DEAD SIR: It is astounding that a man holding the high office of judge in a high court of record in a neighboring state, in this enlightened age, should so demean himself and disgrace the office of trust and responsibility reposed upon him as to make the charge to a grand jury you are, in the public prints, reported to hav made. In reading it one would imagin your honor sitting at the head of some court of grand high inquisition, responsible, not to the people of free and enlightened America for their liberties, but to some ecclesiastical hierarchy of Europe during the middle ages, fiercely and jealously contending for power and prestige.

Children at play get angry and fight if but one of their number makes wry faces at the others. Does a man of character and intellect take offense at such trifles?

Let me answer my own question, sir. If the man is old, is in a state of imbecility or senility, he may be as angry as a child might be at some slight offense.

Tell, me, sir, I pray you, is religion so old or so young that it cannot bear to be laughed at? Is it the old imbecil or the teething babe that cries and screams at Mr. Ingersoll's comic faces?

In your charge, if you are correctly reported, you repeatedly speak of the Christian religion as the prevailing religion of your people, and say that as the prevailing religion it must receive the protection of the courts from all insults. This is monstrous. Hav you, then, a state religion in fact though not in name? Why is it that a religion which happens to be in the minority is not equally entitled to protection? If so, you hav very improperly emphasized the importance of a prevailing religion in its relations to the state. Majorities, especially religious majorities, are only too able to take care of themselvs. They play upon every superstition (the sad inheritance left us by our untutored ancestors) for their own protection and for the destruction of less thoroughly organized systems of religion, or of those of smaller numbers.

If, sir, after showing yourself to be a bitter partisan, and after having threatened to make the sentence of the court as severe as the law will permit upon conviction, you should so little regard your own honor and dignity as to preside at the trial of Mr. Ingersoll (if there ever should be such a trial), will not your honor suffer some little inconvenience in giving a legal construction to these words fully set forth in the bill of indictment for blasphemy found in the wee-bit state of Delaware against Robert G. Ingersoll, in the month of February and in the year of grace 1881, to wit, "notorious blasphemer," "respectable vagabondism," "to destroy the comforting influences of the Sabbath," "to undermine the assurances of faith and hope, the very pillars upon which religion rests," "to spread broadcast among us people blank, fearful doubt," "to extinguish every ray of light that may shine upon the trusting Christian's path of life," "in death even to the soul's eternal rest," "assurances of prompt and exemplary punishment which the honorable the court has expressed," "despised reviler," "impious rhetoric," "character of arch-blasphemer and reviler." These phrases will look lonely in a modern law-book. It would seem to me that the court will find it necessary to "coach" up a little on the star-chamber trials of Queen Mary's reign.

How did Mr. Ingersoll go to work "to destroy the comforting influences of the Sabbath?" What did he do to your Sabbath? Is it possible that he made the week one day shorter in the state of Delaware? If he left you your Sabbath—and I can hardly imagin him so mean as to hav taken it away with him, seeing he had no use for it—what did he do to its "influence?" What is the reason, if you really hav it, that it don't influence as much and as comforting as ever? What is the penalty for destroying the "comforting influences of the Sabbath" in your state?

Here is another very peculiar crime charged in this remarkable presentment against this "respectable vagabond"—attempting, I suppose with force and arms, to "extinguish every ray of light that may shine upon the trusting Christian's path of life." This must be equivalent to covering the state of Delaware with "a mantle of darkness." Of course it will be necessary to show where he got the darkness from to make the mantle of, and how much it required. I hav no doubt it will be shown in the end that he made it in six days out of nothing. He may, however, hav accomplished this hellish crime in some other way; perhaps he did it by putting out your luminaries. Naturally, in doing that, he would begin with the sun. Now, if he put out the sun, as he probably did, as charged substantially in this indictment, he is liable to like presentments in every state in our great Christian republic; the old world, lying in eternal darkness, will never miss the sun, and will no doubt save themselvs the expense of prosecuting this "notorious blasphemer and reviler." Still, in his "character of arch-blaspemer," he might attempt to escape on the technical ground that the crime of putting out the light of the sun must hav been committed on that luminary and not in the state of Delaware, and thus plead the want of jurisdiction, notwithstanding the great territorial jurisdiction of a judge of your state.

It is really a serious question whether the sun was in Delaware the same day Mr. Ingersoll was. The size of the state would seem to preclude even the possibility of the sun's being there; and Mr. Ingersoll himself, you know, is quite a large man?

On the other hand, the fact that even a learned judge is blinded would be circumstantial evidence against him, as it is only too apparent that two such luminous bodies would be altogether too much for you.

I had intended, sir, to write you at considerable length, but on glancing into the newspaper my mind has been wholly diverted from Mr. Ingersoll and this attack of the pigmies upon him by a much greater calamity likely to fall upon a helpless but faithful people, whom, perhaps, your grand jury, under the flaming words of bigotry, will indict some day as "respectable vagabonds."

Here is what appeared so painful to me: "New prosecutions of the Jews are to be apprehended in Russia. Russian official correspondents are openly inciting them by insinuating that the Jews are mediators between Internationalists abroad and the Nihilists in Russia as well as being concerned in circulating forged Russian bank notes made in London by Internationalists expressly for Nihilist purposes." So many crimes being charged show how necessary it is to find something that can be made to serve the purpose. The Russian government wants revenue.

The good work goes on, brother; the prevailing religion is being bravely protected from all insults by wicked and unprincipled men, who use the bad passions and superstitions of their fellows to extend and fortify their power.

I trust, sir, your zeal for souls will so much abate that you will spare Mr. Ingersoll's life, even though you deprive him of that sweet liberty which he has labored so hard to procure for the enjoyment of others in the years that are passing by.

Yours respectfully, MEMBER N. Y. BAR.

"My Opinion."

"I want to express my opinion." I am firmly convinced that every true Liberal is in favor of liberty and justice to all mankind, and who feels that

"Wherever wrong is done
To the humblest and the weakest, 'neath the all-beholding sun,
That wrong is surely done to him; and they are slaves most base
Whose love of right is for themselvs, and not for all the race."

I am further of the opinion that great men become very little when, like Benedict Arnold, they are bribed "by the logic of events," and desert their former good principles. Further, I incline to the opinion that he who can indorse a law enacted and enforced solely for the purpose of crushing out Liberal and Freethought publications, is not a reliable "leader" for Liberal people.

I am not in favor of the "modification" of the laws of the Inquisition or the Sabbath, but desire repeal rather. I am in favor of the repeal of all tyrannical and unjust laws, and the enactment of just laws in their stead. "There is not a man or woman in our League" (numbering 300 members), "who will say he," or she is not opposed to the bigot-proposed and bigot-executed Comstock law.

Reply to Mr. Mair's Eighth Letter.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: It becomes my cheerful duty to correct more of your errors and to again set you right where you are fault. I will with pleasure make known to you what seems to me to be the truth if you will only evince a disposition to embrace it as fast as you perceive its correctness.

I would gladly convince you of your error in thinking there is anything more striking and wonderful in the narrations of the miracles attributed to Jesus than to any others of the reputed miracle-workers of the world, for "I am profoundly impressed with the conviction," that there is no great moral distinction between the big stories told of him and those of Zoroaster, Christna, Buddha, Apollonius, and all the others. I see no more evidence of truthfulness or divinity in the exaggerated and wholly impossible story that the devil took Jesus on his back and carried him on to a very high mountain, where he showed him all the kingdoms on the opposite side of the globe, than in the stories of Christna and Buddha and the conflicts they had with powers of evil. The very fact that is now well understood that the old ideas of the existence of devils and demons were simply unfounded mistaken conceptions, and that nothing of the kind has a real existence, only proves the utter falsity of the miracles attributed to Jesus, who was said to cast out such great numbers of devils, who were the causes of many of the diseases he cured, such as insanity, fits, epilepsy, etc. Physicians now understand the nature of diseases well enough to know that devils have no connection with them, and that there are no devils. If there are no devils, Jesus did not cast them out, and the stories of his miracle-working are false.

I can but feel sorry that my appreciation of your quotations of the prophecies which you gave is not more satisfactory to you, but I took as correct a view of them as possible. Of course I knew that the quotation from Isaiah about the voice of him that crieth in the wilderness was interpreted to apply to John the Baptist, but inasmuch as you were giving the passages from the old prophets which you conceived referred to Jesus I had good reason to suppose you included that with the others. I am quite willing you should have it as you wish, but the language, whether a prophecy or not, is so vague that it applies to one about as well as to another. I by no means feel offended that you have an astute suspicion that my remarks on prophecy sound like Paine, and were you correct I cannot see that there would be anything wrong in it, but your imagination again leads you astray. I did not refer to Paine, though of course, I am proud to say, I read him years ago.

Before leaving the subject of prophecies let me call your attention to their great uncertainty as evinced by that prediction attributed to Jesus respecting his second coming, when he said, "Verily I say unto you this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled," and, "There be some standing which shall not taste of death till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom." This prophecy of Jesus was never fulfilled; not only that generation passed away, but nearly nineteen hundred years have passed away, and the prediction still remains unverified.

I must again correct you in the matter of the Talmud making reference to Jesus; it does refer to Jeshu, but not to the Jesus of the New Testament. But even if the Talmud had the name of Jesus in it, being a later production than the time of Jesus, it would be of no special value.

I will not contend with you as to how the late translation of the New Testament corresponds with that of two hundred and fifty years ago. As neither of us has seen the new we are hardly prepared to talk of it intelligently. You show, however, that the later translators have adopted hades, the Greek word for hell, as the idea of hell itself is Grecian or pagan. Your confession that God's language needs revising and adopting to modern times shows that it is necessarily not immutable and perfect, but requires amending like a human production. Whether these changes are calculated to increase the respect and confidence in the so-called word of God remains to be seen. So far, however, as the word hades being more modern or familiar to the masses than hell, you mistake; it is far less so, and thus the excuse you offer for the changes that have been made is evidently untrue; but in this your statement is much like others of your arguments and representations.

You seem to regard it as quite a point to show by certain writers that such a sect as Christians existed in the first and second centuries. It was wholly unnecessary for you to quote extensively from anybody for that purpose. I have not denied that such a sect existed in those centuries, and have asserted it. That is a very different thing from a historical proof of the existence of Jesus. The mere fact, however, of the existence of a sect of people called Christians falls far short of proving their origin. How they originated is still a debatable and unsettled question. It is my belief that they were a result or outgrowth of the Essenes, the very religious sect which Josephus and Philo clearly show earlier existed in Judea, and who probably were connected with a very similar sect, the Therapeuts of Egypt. The most striking similarities existed between the doctrines and teachings of the Therapeuts, the Essenes, and the Christians. I have given you a few instances where the language of the New Testament, including the words and doctrines attributed to Jesus, bears a striking resemblance to the language and teachings of the Essenes. I can give you fifty more of these instances if you desire it. Here we find the probable source of some of the numerous gospels which had an existence more than a century earlier than anything contained in the four gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. There were several of these earlier gospels, one of which was called the gospel of the Egyptians; but they are lost, and little or no trace is left of them. Eusebius, the first Christian historian, seemed to believe in an Egyptian origin of the gospels. By referring to his Book II. chapter xvii, it will be seen that he gives the opinion that the Therapeuts were Christians and their ancient writings were gospels and epistles. He again asserts that the religion published by Jesus Christ is neither new nor strange.

I do not say there was not in the first century a person called Jesus. The name was a common one, said to be of the same import as Joshua or Josh, and was borne by many. There might have been a Jesus who was the son of the wife of a carpenter by the name of Joseph, and if it was so it was only a very natural circumstance; but unfortunately there is no corroborative proof that even this was the case. There is a great deal of vagueness, a great irregularity, a great uncertainty, in the chain of the story, as the ablest students and writers on the early history of the church inform us, and it would be but simple honesty on your part to admit it.

This person Jesus might have been a very religious individual—there were many such in those times—and after he quitted the carpenter business he might have strolled about the country and occupied himself in talking to those who would listen to him. This, if so, would be nothing unnatural, for hundreds of such characters have risen in all ages of the world. This man might easily have had some personal followers who went with him from place to place, and looked upon him as a prophet or teacher. All this might have been true, for very similar men with followers of a similar character have existed in the world before and since the alleged time of Jesus.

Yes, all this might easily have been true, and not a supernatural or even a marvelous incident occurred in the whole time. But what I insist upon is that there is no historical proof that this Jesus story is true. It might have been so; it might not. One thing is very true, in my belief—that all the supernatural part of the story was a later invention. The immaculate conception, the visit of the angel Gabriel and the Holy Ghost to the Virgin, the interview with the devil, the miracles, the changing of water into wine, the raising to life of dead persons in the state of decomposition, the healing of the lame, the lepers, and the blind, were all a later addition. I will repeat that there is no gospel or story in existence to show that the immaculate conception, the miraculous paternity, the miracles of Jesus, or his physical resurrection were ever mentioned or alluded to before the second century. The epistles of Paul, who had a great deal to do with founding the sect of Christianity, and which epistles are admitted by the ablest students and writers to be much older than either of the canonical gospels, never asserted or alluded to the immaculate conception, the raising of people from the dead, the impossible miracles of Jesus, nor to his physical resurrection. All this was gotten up in the second century and added on to the older story. If you can produce any gospel or epistle that can be shown to have existed before the second century that even hints at the Holy-Ghost-overshadowing business, Jesus and the devil flying through the air together, the astounding miracles of wine-making and reanimating decomposed bodies, and Jesus's physical body going up to heaven, I especially ask you to furnish it.

The fact that these miraculous and impossible features of the story were unknown to Peter and Paul and all who lived at their time, but were invented and added a century later, is most damaging, and utterly destroys the authenticity and reliability of the entire story. What confidence can be had in any old myth of that kind which has been tinkered up, mended, and worked over in that way? Yes, if you can produce a gospel that you can prove was written or existed in the first century that contains aught of the miraculous conception, of the great miracles, and of the physical resurrection, I particularly request you to produce it. If you cannot, I call upon you to throw up the sponge and make no farther claims for the divine authenticity of the story. Anything that so plainly shows the trickery of designing bishops and priests will hardly pass for the work of the Eternal Ruler of the universe. Please consider the importance of this subject, and not pass it ever lightly.

Although you can find here and there a passage in the writings of what are called the apostolic Fathers and the early Fathers that bears some resemblance to passages in the canonical gospels it is no proof that those canonical gospels existed in the first century or before the latter part of the second century. That there were gospels, stories, or legends older than the four now in the New Testament is a matter of no doubt. That the first three of the New Testament gospels were compilations made up from those older, indefinite, and unreliable legends, of which a trace is scarcely left, and that the fourth gospel is a fabrication, there is little doubt. If, then, these New Testament gospels are not the originals, but were made up of the older legends and stories which were floating about the country from mouth to mouth, being modified and changed, as such stories and legends must inevitably change in course of a century, how unreliable it becomes as an authority, and how wrong to compel the world to accept it as the word of God! If it really turns out that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John did not write the gospels named after Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, what an imposition has been practiced upon the world, and how wrong to demand that ignorant, unlearned people shall be made to think they must go into eternal torture—whether called hell or hades—if they do not accept it without a doubt or word of dissent!

You insinuate that I made a charge against Irenæus. This is scarcely just. I charged him with nothing save that he was the first man to allude to our four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, or who seemed to know anything about their existence, and that not before the year 170. I do not say he wrote them or compiled them, nor that he did not. I simply say he was the first to mention them, so far as we have any record, and I cannot let you escape from that. How reliable he was, and how far his theory was with the gospel story, or rather how contradictory and unreliable the whole affair is, may be seen from the fact that in the first three gospels the presentation is made that the ministry of Jesus lasted one year, or, at the farthest, a year and a half, and that the death of Jesus took place when he was thirty-one years of age, while the gospel ascribed to John makes the ministry last from four to seven years, thus changing the death of Jesus to a later period, while Irenæus held and taught that the ministry of Jesus continued for not less than twenty years, and that he lived to be fifty years of age, and he one of the truthful early Fathers to whom you would have me pin my faith as wholly reliable. This is an exemplification of the untruthfulness of the whole story. It just amounts to this: If the extent of the ministry, as given by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, or those who wrote in their name, is correct, that of John is incorrect—false; but if these can be hocus-pocused into apparent harmony, what are we to think of Irenæus, who insisted that the ministry lasted twenty years? Could he be honest, or was he ignorant? What avails it if it is claimed that he knew Polycarp, who knew John, who knew Jesus? If that was true, and what they were writing about was true, there ought to have been more harmony in their stories. Ah, the whole thing is a most unreliable jargon. The reasons which Irenæus gave why there should be just four gospels and no more—because there are four corners to the earth, four spirits, and four-faced cherubim, etc.—I repeat, was most frivolous; and in this day no person capable of using such arguments would be called honest. His quotation from the gospel of John, when he says, "John related the words of the Lord concerning the times of the kingdom of God; the days would come when vines would grow, each with ten thousand shoots, and to each shoot ten thousand branches, and to each branch ten thousand twigs, and to each twig ten thousand clusters, and to each cluster ten thousand grapes, and to each grape which is crushed will yield twenty-five measures of wine," when there is nothing of such nonsense in John or either of the other gospels, rather looks as though Irenæus was not over honest, or not a man whose word or statements could be depended upon. He may have made that quotation from some of the gospels not handed down to us, of which Mosheim informs us there were many, "full of pious frauds and fabulous wonders which were composed by persons whose intentions were not bad, but whose writings discovered the greatest superstition and ignorance. Nor was this all. Productions appeared which were imposed upon the world by fraudulent men as the writings of the holy apostles." This quotation from Mosheim gives a clear view of the business of gospel-writing and how little reliance is to be placed upon it. That the four gospels ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were largely gotten up in this way there is little room to doubt. That they were not the original stories is most true.

Your effort to show that some of the apostolic and early Christian Fathers quoted from our four New Testament gospels does not escape my notice; but I cannot concede to you the spirit of strict honesty in this effort. Although a few of the quotations and allusions made before the year 170 bear a similarity to some of the passages in our four gospels it only proves that these four gospels were made up of the older but lost gospels. I must repeat that the four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John as they stand in the New Testament were unknown to the apostolic Fathers and the Christian Fathers before the time of Irenæus; nor is there the slightest proof that they mentioned them or made any quotations from them. That they had seen some of the lost gospels and were familiar with the legends about Jesus I will not deny, the same as the Swiss people to-day are familiar with the mythical story of William Tell and the children of Europe and America with the exploits of Robinson Crusoe.

That there is no proof that one of the so-called apostolic or early Christian Fathers named in my last knew anything of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, as they stand in the New Testament. I have the able and positive authorities before mentioned, which are far more conclusive than your quotations of similar passages from uncanonical and unknown gospels. Your own admissions that Paley said there was very little eminence attached to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, that very little is said of Matthew, that the gospels never mentioned Mark or Luke, is also conclusive in the same direction. If the so-called four evangelists were chosen to be God's historians, and they were inspired to write the whole truth and nothing but the truth, they assuredly should not have been so lightly esteemed nor so thoroughly ignored. Had these gospels existed and been regarded as the church now regards them the apostolic Fathers and the early Christian Fathers would certainly have alluded to them instead of quoting from the old legendary gospels, which never formed a part of the canon and were soon utterly lost.

Among the lost gospels may be named the gospels of Paul, Peter, the Hebrews, the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Scythians, Perfection, Philip, Andrew, Bartholomew, Eve, Matthias, Judas Iscariot, Apelles, Barnabas, Harmony or Basilides, Cerinthus, Encratites, the Gnostics, Hesychius, Helkesaites, Justin, James, Jude, the Lord, Lucius, Lucinus, Manes, Merinthus, Simonides, Thaddeus, Tatian, the Gospel of Truth, the Gospel of Life, the Eternal Gospel, etc. What are called the apocryphal gospels are still more numerous, and in the aggregate make a formidable array. You have the right to believe that all of them or that only a part of them were written by God or by his direction. You have the right to pick out four of them and say these four are the genuine word and work of God, and all the rest are the work of the devil, if you choose to; but I shall not join you; I look upon all of them as the work of men and am fully of the opinion that God did not occupy himself about any of them. If he had any partiality for any particular four of them, it is very singular that he should have allowed them to be kept in obscurity for a century and a half, allowing the apostolic and Christian Fathers to make quotations from the uncanonical or devilish gospels. Far better is the truthful ground that he had nothing to do with any of them.

The great discrepancies and contradictions between our four gospels, particularly between John and the other three, is very damaging to the idea that they could have been dictated by the same truthful being. We have seen that John makes the mission of Jesus continue four or five times as long as do the other three; he represents Jesus as visiting Jerusalem several times, while the others admit of only one visit; he gives an entirely different set of miracles from the others; he has little to say about the parables of Jesus which Matthew and Luke dwell upon so largely; he makes Jesus give long, wordy, metaphysical sermons, wholly unlike the other story tellers, and presents a materially different character. That they did not all emanate from the same brain is most evident. That taken all in all they are an incoherent, incongruous, incompatible, contradictory mass of improbable and unproved absurdities is equally clear.

I will use a little space with one of my important authorities to show that none of the Fathers before the year 170 mentioned the four canonical gospels which form the most important part of the New Testament. Prof. F. W. Newman of the London University, the admitted author of "Supernatural Religion," one of the ripest scholars of our age, has made more thorough investigations in this direction than any other man, and his conclusions are entitled to the greatest confidence. He takes up the apostolic and Christian Fathers one by one, gives the quotations they made from uncanonical gospels, tells what they said upon the subject, arriving conclusively to the decision that up to Irenæus they knew nothing of our four gospels. I would gladly make citations from him and give his conclusions after exhaustively treating each of the Fathers and early writers, but space will not admit of it.

To Clement of Rome and the writings accredited to him he devotes thirty pages octavo, of close print, in which he shows many quotations not in the canonical gospels, but none taken from them. He closes with the admission of Tischendorf that there are no indications of an acquaintance with the canonical gospels.

To the epistles of Ignatius sixteen pages are devoted; he finds quotations which were the common property of the oral legends, but says in no case is there any written source indicated from which these passages are derived. He closes by saying: "The anonymous quotations of historical expressions of Jesus cannot prove the existence of one special document among many to which we may choose to trace it. This is more especially to be insisted on from the fact that hitherto we have not met with any mention of any one of our gospels, and have no right even to assume their existence from any evidence which has been furnished."

Justin Martyr—one hundred pages are devoted to this Father, including his writings in the Greek in which he wrote them, with the quotations which he made from the lost gospels, prominent among which the professor mentions the Gospel of Nicodemus. In the closing paragraph he says: "It is not necessary, however, for the purposes of this examination, to dwell more fully upon the question as to what specific gospel now no longer extant Justin employed. We have shown that there is no evidence that he made use of any of our gospels; and he cannot therefore be cited even to prove their existence, and much less to attest the authenticity and character of records whose authors he does not once name. On the other hand, it has been made evident that there were other gospels, now lost, but which then enjoyed the highest consideration, from which his quotations might have been and probably were taken."

To Hegesippus eight pages are given, and with no better results. The concluding remarks are these: "Tischendorf, who so eagerly searches for every trace, real or imaginary, of the use of our gospels and of the existence of a New Testament canon, passes over in silence, with the exception of a short note devoted to the denial that Hegesippus was opposed to Paul, this first writer of Christian church history, whose evidence, could it have been adduced, would have been so valuable. He does not pretend that Hegesippus made use of the canonical gospels or knew of any other holy scriptures than those of the Old Testament; and, on the other hand, he does not mention that he possessed and quoted from the gospel according to the Hebrews. Nothing is more certain than the fact that, in spite of the opportunity for collecting information afforded him by his travels through so many Christian communities for the express purpose of such inquiry, Hegesippus did not find any New Testament canon, or that such a rule of faith did not yet exist in Rome in A. D. 160–170. There is no evidence whatever to show that Hegesippus recognized any other evangelical work than the Gospel according to the Hebrews, as the source of his knowledge, together with tradition, of the words of the Lord."

To Papias twenty-eight pages are devoted, and at the close he writes in this way: "Whatever books Papias knew, however, it is certain from his own express declaration that he ascribed little importance to them, and preferred tradition as a more reliable source of information regarding evangelical history. 'For I held that what was to be derived from books,' he says, 'did not so profit me as that from the living and abiding voice (of tradition).' If, therefore, it could even have been shown that Papias was acquainted with any of our canonical gospels, it could only have been with the accompanying fact that he did not recognize them as authoritative documents. It is manifest from the evidence adduced, however, that Papias did not know our gospels. It is not possible that he could have found it better to inquire, 'what John or Matthew, or what any other of the disciples of the Lord . . . say,' if he had known of gospels such as ours actually written by them deliberately telling him what they had to say. The work of Matthew, which he mentions being, however, a mere collection of discourses of Jesus, he might naturally inquire what the apostle himself said of the history of the Master. The evidence of Papias is in every respect most important. He is the first writer who mentions that Matthew and Mark were believed to have written any works at all; but whilst he shows that he does not accord any canonical authority even to the works attributed to them, his description of those works and his general testimony come with crushing force against the pretensions made on behalf of our gospels to apostolic origin and authenticity."

To the Clementines twenty-eight pages are accorded, and the learned author decides emphatically that the Homilies which "never name or indicate a single gospel as the source of the author's knowledge of evangelical history, whose quotations of sayings of Jesus, numerous as they are, systematically differ from the parallel passages in our synoptics, or are altogether foreign to them, which denounce the apostle Paul as an impostor, enemy of the faith, and disseminator of false doctrine, and therefore repudiate his epistles, at the same time equally ignoring all the other writings of the New Testament, can scarcely be considered as giving much support to any theory of the early formation of the New Testament canon or as affording evidence even of the existence of its separate books."

After a brief treatment of the epistle to Diognetus he decides that it affords no proof even of the synoptic gospels, "for it is admitted that it does not contain a single direct quotation from any evangelical work."

So I might continue on and give his most damaging decisions after fully examining the writings of Basilides, Valentinus, Tatian, Dionysius of Corinth, Melito of Sardis, and many others, and how he found no proofs that any of them ever saw or knew aught of any of the canonical gospels, so called; but it would virtually be a repetition of what has already been said, and my prescribed space is occupied.

Some one hundred and sixty pages are employed in an examination of the fourth gospel, and glad would I be to give many pages of the author's most sensible conclusions, but I cannot do so for want of room. He makes clear the great dissimilarity and disagreement between the fourth gospel and the other three, and finds much proof that it was not written till the latter part of the second century, and finds none whatever that it had an existence at an earlier day.

More than two hundred pages are used in a careful examination, analysis, and comparison of the book of the Acts of the Apostles; and the learned author finds the work not only anonymous, but to have been written at a much later date than when the events therein related are said to have occurred. He finds many contradictions and utter absurdities, and that its profuse display of impossible miracles adds no proof to the claims of supernatural religion. As the book was wholly unknown till the latter part of the second century, it is very safe to conclude that it was not written by Luke nor any of the apostles, nor even by any one who knew the apostles. As a history, or as a proof of the claims of the four gospels, it has no value whatever.

The views and conclusions of Prof. Newman are coincided with by W. Rathbone Greg in the "Creed of Christendom." Probably two men of sounder minds and more thorough investigations into the claims of supernatural religion have never lived. Their learning, candor, and ability give their examinations and conclusions great merit and force. They are compelled in the light of truth to decide that the four gospels of the New Testament were not written by the persons nor at the time when they are pretended to have been written, and that there is nothing to justify the great reverence and credibility which has been accorded them. Judge Waite, in his new work, arrives at the same conclusion, and clearly shows that the apostolic Fathers and the early Christian Fathers knew nothing of the books composing the New Testament, save a few of the epistles of Paul, and perhaps one of Peter; that the gospels which were known and used by these Fathers and all the early Christians were lost, and that those we now have were produced by later hands and brains. And being wholly anonymous, compiled from the legends and traditions that had had but a precarious existence, and being arranged by those who neither knew Jesus nor the apostles, there is no reason why they should be accepted as truthful history or as a record of the performance of miracles.

The great fact cannot be lost sight of that the story of Jesus, of his miracles, life, death, resurrection, and ascension, is involved in deep doubt, in inextricable confusion and uncertainty; from all of which it is most clear that the credulous believers of the gospel story have beeen decidedly wheedled and greatly imposed upon. It is emphatically not what it pretends to be.

It matters nothing whether Hone changed his views or not, or whether he had any. His early or late opinions cannot change the unreliable character of the New Testament a particle. He was unable to detract from its strength or to add to its weakness. Men of great and small caliber have so often changed opinions in all conceivable directions that his case need not excite much wonder.

Your attempt to show that nobody but a Jew could write the four gospels strikes me as being very weak—much like the claim often set up that the books must be divine, as no man has been capable of writing such productions. There is nothing in them that an ordinarily smart man of any nationality could not write. If you can see anything in them calling for special veneration, your sight is better than mine. But some people admire fiction more than truth.

Your paragraph of pious talk about the soul's anxiety to find a living savior, and perceiving in the canonical gospels such confirmation of their truth, I will let pass for what it is worth. Should I detract even but little from it, nothing would remain.

Not having room now to take up the subject of how the canon of the New Testament was settled, nor to introduce our fourth thesis, I subscribe myself,

Sincerely yours,

D. M. B.

Thoughts on Religion.—Continued.

BY AN INVALID, AT THE NEAR APPROACH OF DEATH.

CONTAINING A BRIEF REVIEW OF GOD'S DEALINGS WITH MANKIND AS GIVEN IN THE BIBLE, INCLUDING THE FALL, THE FLOOD, THE TOWER OF BABEL, GOD'S PECULIAR PEOPLE, THE JEWS, THE NEW DISPENSATION, WARS BETWEEN MOHAMMEDANS AND CHRISTIANS, CHRISTIANS PERSECUTING EACH OTHER, SCIENCE AND RELIGION, WITH SOME SUGGESTIONS AS TO A BETTER WAY.

I now proceed to a consideration of the assertion that the Bible makes God a stupendous failure. And you will please bear in mind that I do not assert God to be a failure, for I cannot conceive how mortal man can know of God, his knowledge, power, or attributes. I merely say that the Bible account makes him a failure. By that book we are taught that God is a self-created, omnipotent, and omniscient being, infinit in his attributes of power, knowledge, justice, love, mercy, etc. Therefore he was not only able to accomplish just what he chose, but was so constituted that the final result of everything was plainly visible to his omniscient perception before the first act of creativ power was accomplished. Every thought, word, and deed of every person who might be called into existence from the beginning to the end of time must hav been plainly seen and definitly understood. For a being with these powers and attributes to do anything that would need any correction or in any manner prove a failure would be simply impossible.

Well, what do we find? That he created the world, also the heavenly bodies, animals, and man, everything. "And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." But almost the first act of the man and woman was to do that which made them and every one else bad—so very bad that all merited eternal punishment; and the first man born was not only a murderer, but a fratricide. Mankind grew and multiplied and became very numerous. But it would seem that they grew in iniquity as well as in numbers, until about sixteen hundred and fifty years had passed, when it would seem that they became so wicked that God could not endure them any longer. "And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart." What should the Lord do in view of such a situation? What he should hav done we will not tell, but what he did. And the Lord said, "I will destroy man whom I hav created from the face of the earth; both man and beast, and creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I hav made them." This, of itself, would seem sufficient to prove the assertion that the God of the Bible is a failure, for, if he is infinit, he would not hav made so grievous a mistake that he would be sorry and repent. This, however, is only the beginning, for right there he seems to hav changed his mind. What! the great omniscient deity change his mind! Yes, for "Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord," for he was a "just man and perfect, and walked with God." So it would seem that in order to replenish the world with a better race that he could tolerate, God saved Noah and his family, with enough of the animals, birds, and creeping things to begin again. This man being "just and perfect in his generation," it would seem there need be no danger of failure this time—that God would be relieved from the danger of repentance and sorrow, and man from punishment here or hereafter.

How strange, then, that this just and perfect man should—almost the first thing recorded of him after the flood—be guilty of getting intoxicated and acting indecently! This perfect man, whom God had saved from all others to raise up a better people, how humiliating that he should be the one to introduce drunkenness into the world! It may be said, as an excuse for Noah, that he knew nothing of the intoxicating qualities of wine; and as probably none had ever been made before, he was not blamable.

Admitting this to be the case does not confute the assertion that the Bible makes God a failure; but, if anything, it strengthens it by placing it on God alone, for he, by reason of his foreknowledge, knew all about it before he changed his plan of destroying all by the flood and saving Noah because he was just and perfect.

When we contemplate the amount of poverty, crime, and misery that now exist in consequence of intemperance, it is hardly in accord with God's infinit wisdom and love that he could hav known all this, had the supreme control of all things, and so ordered events that it were possible for such a situation to be the result.

God having blessed Noah and his sons, and told them to multiply and replenish the earth, they did so; and after about a thousand years they "found" the plain of Shinar, and resolved to build a city and a tower, "lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." So they began to build the Tower of Babel, their object in building it being to prevent being scattered. God, in order, to scatter them, confounded their language. And why did God do this? Because he wished to restrain them, for in the language of the Bible, "And now nothing will be restrained from them which they hav imagined to do." The reason for this dispersion of mankind is not definit, but appears to be that if the people remained united God could not control them. This seems to be the origin of another difference—a conflict between rebellious man and his maker.

After this God called Abram, who, from the birth of Isaac and the covenant made with him, was changed to Abraham, and became the father of God's peculiar chosen people. For notwithstanding Noah was saved from the flood because he was a "just man and perfect" for the purpose of replenishing the earth with a better people, man had by this time become so perverse that the account givs us to understand God gave up the idea of having all people good, and chose a few who he would hav as his own, who should be under his especial care and supervision for his own glory. The account of his dealings with this people of his choice is long, and presents a catalog of inhumanity, consisting of wars, murders, deceptions, falsehoods, and final failure, such as is nowhere else recorded in the history of the world, for, after all God's efforts in their behalf, they were and would continue to be a perverse, stiff-necked, and rebellious people.

Then what should be done? God had made man perfect, sinless, and he had fallen. Of the millions that had lived, only two were without sin, and they only for a very short. An attempt had been made to regenerate the race by drowning all except one family, and that had failed. Then an effort was made to hav only a few that should glorify their creator by obedience to him, and even this could not be accomplished.

About four thousand years in the history of the world had passed, and this was the situation—a succession of failures sufficient to discourage everything but deity himself. And now the Bible reveals a scheme for the redemption and perfect happiness of all mankind, both here and hereafter—a scheme that in some not very clearly defined manner should embrace all who had previously lived, as well as those who might liv in all future time; a sacrifice that should be an atonement for the sins of the whole world and effectually propitiate and appease the wrath of the creator toward the creatures of his creation. This was nothing less than the giving of a part of himself to satisfy the wrath of himself that he bore toward mankind for doing just what he foresaw they would do before he breathed the breath of life into Adam and he became a living soul. A sacrifice so great as this, embracing all the infinit benevolence and love of deity, certainly should be effectual and assure the eternal happiness of all.

Now the great question among Bible religionists is, Has, or will, this very desirable object of the salvation of all mankind proved effectual? On this point they hav differed, and do differ, so radically that there seems little hope of reconciliation. Man's free will, and God's decrees, with a great number of other knotty questions that learned biblical expounders hav made more foggy and less understood, irritate and divide mankind.

At the coming of Christ an era of peace and good will was to dawn upon the world. He was the lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, and yet he himself said that he came not to bring peace but a sword, etc., together with a great many other vague and contradictory ideas that only serve the very convenient purpose of enabling different religious sects to play a great variety of tunes on that same old fiddle.

One prominent feature of this new dispensation was to revive in a more virulent form a question that for hundreds of years had been the chief cause of contention between God's chosen people and the idolatrous nations that surrounded them; this was the question of monotheism and polytheism. Previous to this the contest had been as to whether there was one true and living God, or whether there were many that might be worshiped by proxy or by paying adoration to some tangible object that was supposed to represent deity. But now the question became intensified by the introduction of this new theory that there were three live Gods in one. And here I will again call attention to the terrible inconsistency of reasoning, thinking beings having such prolonged contests over a matter that is past finding out.

About three hundred years after the birth of Christ the Roman empire, then under the Emperor Constantine, adopted Christianity as the national religion. Previous to this, although paganism prevailed, it had been the policy of Rome in conquering the world, to leave each nation to the enjoyment of its religious opinions. During these three hundred years Christianity had increased rapidly, and sects had already begun to multiply. The question of deity was not well settled. Some thought it absurd that God could hav a mother. Others thought that he not only had a mother, but that she was a part of the godhead. But probably what more than anything else served to unite them on this matter was the appearance of Mohammed and the fearful meteoric splendor with which Mohammedanism flashed over the world. This was about six hundred years after Christ.

Mohammed adopted monotheism—the one living God Allah—with the doctrin of God's absolute decrees, and predestination. War was the means of propagating this doctrin, and the motto was, "The Koran or the sword." The Christians met them with the doctrin of a triune God and a contest for the possession of the holy sepulcher and the city of Jerusalem, where Christ was crucified. In about one hundred and fifty years the Saracens were masters of the greater portion of the then civilized world. The Christians retained possession of Rome, but from Central Asia to the Atlantic the Mohammedans had taken all the other important cities. The world was deluged in blood, and all because mankind could not agree as to whether the godhead was composed of one or three persons. The world had fought to death its prosperity. The dark ages came on, but the fight still for a time went on until probably from sheer exhaustion more than anything else it ceased.

Does this look like peace on earth and good will toward men? Was it necessary for mankind to suffer all this as a result of the new dispensation? Can it be that God foresaw all this as a result of the mission of the prince of peace? Was it or was it not another failure?

But the end of this matter was not yet. As the world began to outgrow the effects of the conflicts between Mohammedans and Christians, differences between Christians began to arise and multiply, until all the horrors of the Inquisition prevailed and spread and multiplied until a cry of anguish must hav arisen that startled the world more than the star of Bethlehem. This was simply the torturing of Christians by other Christians, the greatest matter of difference seeming to be an infallible Bible or an infallible pope. Catholics burned and turtured Protestants, and Protestants did the same to Catholics with all the malignant ingenuity that they could invent, and all in the name of Jesus, "the lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world."

Will intelligent and truthful people tell us that Christianity makes its votaries good, charitable, benevolent, love one another, etc., when it caused Christians to perpetrate all these horrible cruelties upon each other? Perhaps we shall be told that they were not true Christians or they would not hav done such things. If they were not true Christians then they could not be found, for these horrible things were practiced more or less by all who professed Christianity.

And as we follow the history of religion down to the time when America became known and began to be settled, we find the same spirit of bigotry and intolerance in a modified form came with them. The Puritans who settled New England fled to the wilds of America that they might escape persecution and enjoy their religion unmolested; but did they accord the same rights to others? No, not at all! Their laws and their acts went so far as to perpetrate the same acts of barbarism that had occurred in Europe, but happily only few in number when compared with those that had been enacted there.

A few were burned, some hanged, and others banished. And two hundrd years or a little more brings us down to the present.

Nearly nineteen hundred years hav passed since, according to the Bible, this new dispensation that was to bring peace on earth and good will toward men; and although I hav only very faintly, and in a hurried and desultory manner, portrayed some of the dark and cruel history of the effects of religion in those times, yet it is enough, yes, one would think more than enough, to justify the assertion (viewed in the light of the Bible and history) that God is a stupendous failure.

This last great and magnanimous act of God in giving a part of himself to appease his wrath in order that mankind might all be saved from eternal perdition results in this, that notwithstanding all the sufferings that living humanity has endured, according to the present liberal orthodox Christian standard, only a few are saved from that future eternal punishment where "the smoke of their torment ascendeth forever and ever." I know there are some who try to prove from the Bible that there is no hell; they might just as well try to prove there is no heaven; they could do it just as easily; and the only reason they do not is because they do not wish to. On the principle that sectarians hav proved and still prove to their own satisfaction just what they choose to it might be done.

In answer to the question whether all or only a few are saved, who should know better than Christ? When asked, "Lord, are there few that be saved?" he answered, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many shall seek to enter in and shall not be able." And, again, in another place, evidently referring to the same thing, he said: "Wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat. Because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." This is the foundation for the old hymn that we hav so often heard sung in prayer and protracted meetings:

"Broad is the road that leads to death,

And thousands walk together there.
While strait the narrow way to life,
With here and there a traveler."

Christ answered this question—Are there few that are saved?—as directly and definitly as he was in the habit of answering questions, for it was seldom, if ever, that he gave a direct answer to any question. He usually answered evasivly or in parables.

The question will naturally be asked, Would you reject the many wise and good things that are in the Bible? Would you reject the beautiful, sublime, and charitable sayings of Christ?

No! I would reject nothing whatever, come from what source it might, that will enlighten, elevate, and instruct mankind, and make them happier, better, more charitable, and help them to travel in the path that leads to a better mode of life. The New Testament is a great improvement on the Old; its teachings as a whole are more wise and benevolent; Christ taught many things that should be remembered always, and repeated often. But there is no danger that they will be forgotten or lost without the Bible, indeed, they may be the better known and understood without it, for it contains so much that is bad and cannot be understood that is the greatest objection to the teachings of Christ. They are so inextricably allied to and bound up with the "law and the prophets," he himself was so particular to hav it understood that he "came not to destroy the law but to fulfil;" that "heaven and earth might pass away, but not one jot or tittle of the law till all be fulfilled," etc. This of itself has the effect to render the good of his teachings in a measure nugatory, for it leads directly to the differences caused by creeds, doctrins, and all the interminable bickerings, so vividly portrayed by Mr. Beecher, in the extract from his sermon quoted in the fore part of this essay.

The common humanity of mankind, if properly cultivated, would not allow them to forget, or forget to teach, all that is good and just of his saying, without being so blinded by parables, miracles, and the law.

Although the foregoing are grave objections to receiving the teachings of Christ as inspired, and therefore infallible in every word and sentence, they are not all, for if Christ himself was a part of the infinit creator of all things, whatever he said or did should hav been perfect. Perhaps some good Christians will be constrained to say in their reverence of his heart: "I hope he is not going to criticise Christ; I would not dare to," and any person who does should forfeit the respect of all good men. All such may call it what they will, I intend merely to giv a very few illustrations from the book itself, which may be pondered, and each one come to his own conclusions.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

My Trip East.—Continued.

BY W. F. JAMIESON.

Christians and Materialists may be guilty of narrowness and one-sidedness, but it does not become Spiritualists to accuse them of either. Read what Prof. S. B. Brittan, one of the oldest and best educated of their number, has to say of them:

"Whoever will wage an uncompromising war with error by following truth, reason, and his deepest convictions, wherever they may lead, will find that life is no mere holiday entertainment" (Banner of Light, Oct. 16, 1880).

In that same article he represents his Spiritual brethren as a more intolerant set than the "bigoted churches." Said he, "My views had been perversely misrepresented, and with a persistency for which I could recall no precedent from my early experience in a sectarian church."

Any one who has been much among Spiritualists, and values truth more than ism; any one, once a believer, who has the audacity to question the spirit-origin theory, knows that those words of Prof. Brittan are true. Numbers, though counted by millions, will not make a bad principle a good one; will not make error truth; will not make bigotry liberality. There are liberal-minded, truth-loving, humanity-helping Spiritualists, and these good qualities do not fail them when their own views are roughly handled or denied altogether.

Spiritualism, as was years ago declared by some of its opponents, is Universalism gone to seed. Its speculations are based upon love of the marvelous and smell of the lamp of Aladdin.

Mr. Hull, who is one of the liberal class of Spiritual believers, seemed quite anxious that I should test Mr. J. V. Mansfield's powers. Again and again hav I searched for truth in the "Spiritual" direction.

Mr. Mansfield is a thorough gentleman, and, as far as I could judge, a sincere Spiritualist. He has been for years renowned as a successful Spiritual postmaster. According to appointment I met him in his pleasant rooms. I had indited the following letters before visiting the gentleman, and inclosed them in an envelope secured by mucilage:

NEW YORK, Jan. 5. 1881.

DEAR FATHER: In order that I may really know that you liv, will you please answer the following questions?

1. In what year did you die?
2. What month?
3. What date?

(I hav not in mind the precise date, so if you giv it it will not come from my mind.)

4. What is your elder brother's name?
5. Did you not love him very much?
6. Is mother with you?
7. Giv me her first name and maiden name.
8. Did you and mother giv me the initial "F"?
9. On which side, yours or mother's, was it obtained?
10. Where were you born?
11. What was your business?
12. Giv me your sister's name, please.

Your affectionate son, W. F. JAMIESON.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1881.

MY DEAR MOTHER: For ten years your letters, once a week so regularly written, hav been sorely missed. You know, if you exist, and can read my thoughts, that every fiber of my being is attuned to love of the truth for its own sake. You know that I hav fearlessly cast my all, without the hope of earthly or heavenly reward, with the truth as I understand it. I hav no prejudice against Spiritualism. If it is true, and I can know that you still liv, I will gladly welcome the fact.

1. Please write your name in full, maiden name included.
2. Write your eldest sister's name in full.
3. Where did she liv in 1846?
4. Where in 1848?
5. Where were you in 1847–8?
6. Where did we all go in 1849?
7. By what route did we travel?
8. Where did we land at the end of the journey? With what family did we visit? If you really liv, and I can obtain proof of the fact, I will write you often.
9. What brother died in M.?
10. What one in O.?
11. What were their diseases?

Your loving son, W. F. JAMIESON.

P. S.—This spiritual postmaster knows my name, so I write it in full.

The next was written in shorthand to a student of mine.

NEW YORK, Jan. 7, 1881.

JAMES O. BROWN, My Dear Friend: I am after facts. You are aware that we both believed in Spiritualism. I now ask you:

1. Of whom did you learn phonography?
2. Where did you learn it?
3. What year?
4. What is your father's name?
5. What is the name of my eldest sister's husband. You knew him well.
6. Hav I not always taken the proper course to investigate Spiritualism?
7. Please giv me the names of your two elder sisters.
8. Giv me their present names.
9. In what year did you die?
10. In what town did you liv when I first became acquainted with you?
11. Will I ever obtain absolute proof that spirits exist after the death of their bodies, and that they communicate with mankind?
12. Will I ever see a spirit, and no mistake?
13. You were acquainted with Graham's nomenclature. Please giv me the key to this: Net les despaging petoid Ged's zedem th les destertiv petoid iss gedens. Way Eff Jay.

Your affectionate friend, W. F. JAMIESON.

Had either of them lived on earth such letters would hav brought me satisfactory responses. I could hav obtained unmistakable proofs of their identity, and such proofs Spiritualists claim to hav. In this case, however, Mr. Mansfield, with a world-wide reputation, could obtain no answer. He made not the least attempt to tamper. His demeanor throughout our interview was that of a kind-hearted, truth-loving gentleman. After passing his fingers over the envelope, and pressing it beneath his fingertips, he said he could not obtain a response. He then inquired if I had written more than one question.

"Yes," I replied; "a number."

"That is it;" said he, "you should hav written but one at a time. I do not promis to do anything, but will try. Sometimes as many as eighty questions hav been answered."

He then requested me to write on slips of printing paper.

FIRST LETTER.

NEW YORK, Jan. 7, 1881.

DEAR MOTHER: Will you giv me proof that you liv by furnishing your full name?

I rolled or folded the long slips so that Mr. Mansfield could not see the writing. Mr. Mansfield then received it, and with mucilage fastened it at the fold, leaving about one foot of the blank at the bottom, upon which something or somebody wrote the following:

"Lord bless you, Jamieson! Your mother had a name as well as a relation, and I do not know her name if you do. We must hav the name, or how could we be expected to find her?

"E. V. WILSON."

As far as I could determin, Mr. Mansfield did not read what I wrote, and the allusion to my inquiry is, therefore, peculiar, but no test of spirit intelligence. In answering it the medium took it ten or twelve feet from where I was sitting, to his table. He requested me to write another question during the time he was engaged in getting the answer. Under these circumstances I kept my eye upon him as well as I could while engaged writing my second letter on the broad casement of the window.

SECOND LETTER.

NICHOLSON O. JAMIESON, My Dear—[Just at that moment it occurred to me not to giv any key.] You name the relationship. You come in person. Why is it that my mother could not hav come herself and answered my question? She knows her own name and all the circumstances that would prove beyond doubt that she livs. I want to know if you all liv.

W. F. J.

ANSWER.

"It is no use, my dear William, to fight against facts. I know your mind has been entangled with the unexplained nature, yet the truth remains the same, that I do liv beyond Albion soil. I tell you I do. N. O. JAMIESON."

At that time it began to look as if I were really getting into communication with a spirit. It was a puzzler how he got the name without reading my writing. Knowing my own desire is to get truth, and, if possible, without mixture of error, I concluded to follow the clue. The reference to Albion was what Spiritualists would call a test.

While Mr. Mansfield was writing the foregoing I indited the following in phonography:

THIRD LETTER.

NEW YORK, Jan. 7, 1881.

JAMES O. BROWN, Dear Friend: Can you giv me evidence, positiv proof, as if you were on earth, that you liv? Answer me in such a way that I do not need to ask questions. You know what will be proof beyond the possibility of doubt.

Your old friend, JAMIESON.

ANSWER.

"You are too much for me, Jamieson. I do not read your phonography. Giv us square and plain English, and then we will look for you.

"MANSON TALCOTT,
"E. V. WILSON,
"HARRISON BARRETT."

I do not know how Mr. Mansfield knew that I wrote that in phonography, but because I did not understand the modus operandi of his answers, there was not the least proof, in my judgment, of spirit communion. I had previously given "square and plain English," and still the response did not bring proof.

FOURTH LETTER.

NEW YORK, Jan. 7, 1881,

MY DEAR FRIEND WILSON: You tell me you could not read my phonography. Well, now let us come down to common sense. Hav you no phonographers in your world? Am I to understand that reporters hav no souls? Come, now, E. V., you know I am after facts. My brother's name is signed to a communication just received. Go on. Where is James O. Brown? Get him to come.

Yours for everlasting truth, W. F. JAMIESON.

The other names I did not recognize. I received no answer to the foregoing. Strange, is it not, that if there really is a telegraph between this world and a spiritual one, that the "spirits" could not decipher my shorthand, especially when Mr. Mansfield, the distinguished spiritual postmaster, receives and answers letters in various languages?

FIFTH LETTER.

"NICK: Can you giv me some of the leading incidents in our boyhood days?"

ANSWER.

"MY DEAR SON: We are with you at this time, but we hav not control to say more specifically. Roland Hill, with Charles H. Bissell, was present and wanted to say a word to Sarah, his sorrowing wife and her noble boy, but he had not control.

"Your father, NICHOLSON O. JAMIESON."

The wires were working badly by this time. My father must be growing old "over there," for he has forgotten his name. My brother's name was Nicholson, but father's was James.

In my investigation of Spiritualism I hav discovered that the so-called spirits cannot bear cross-questioning. Whenever I hav pressed the investigation, and urged the supposed spirit to giv detailed information about himself, it has invariably resulted in failure.

The hour and a half spent with Mr. Mansfield was far from misspent time. Would that all Spiritualists were as Liberal and pleasant as he. He did all he could to make my investigation satisfactory, and it was no fault of his that I did not receive proof. There may be some power about him or peculiarity of organization which he mistakes for spirit control.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

For Iowa Liberals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: That is a splendid article of Secretary Leland's—"Ways and Means"—and should be studiously read and prayerfully considered by all Liberals. It is a pity that there is need of such articles being written, but it is a sad fact that there are scores of Infidels where there is one Liberal. Iowa needs the plowshare of Lelandism to be driven deep through the soil of her secularism to arouse the Hawkeye heretics to a sense of their duties and responsibilities. We hav some few most earnest workers within our borders, but Iowa has never been the best of fields for Liberal lecturers. The brilliant, noble, and self-sacrificing Mrs. Lake was forced to seek in New York the support she could not find in this state, though we pride ourselvs upon being so much more unsectarian than the East. Prof. Phelps leaves us for Kansas, and stays there, while Mrs. Parry and others find "border-ruffian" Missouri a far better field for the sowing of the Liberal seed than our own seemingly fertil soil. This state of things must cease to be. We hav a state League, but it is powerless for good until we hav the proper documents for instruction and distribution; we cannot hav the documents until we hav the money. I hav put in weeks of work preparing the needed information and writing to Iowa secularists soliciting funds. Shall the good work go forward? Our hand-book will be of value to Liberals everywhere, and will be sold at fifteen cents per copy, three for thirty-five cents, or eleven for a dollar. A church-taxation leaflet at thirty-five cents per hundred, or $2.75 per thousand, will also be useful in all parts of our wide domain. Then let the annual and life members of the Iowa Liberal Leagues be numerously increased—annual, fifty cents; life, five dollars. I want to continue in the work in Iowa, but I cannot furnish both time and money. E. C. WALKER, Sec. Iowa L. L.

Letters from Friends.

GRANBURY, TEX., March 18, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Place me on the fund for the trip around the world for five dollars and the book. Send me notice when you desire to start, and I will send the money. Yours truly, F. C. BUSH.

COTTONWOOD FALLS, KAN., March 20, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Last January I read a notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER that you would send books or pamphlets to any one that would send you a list of names. I took advantage of the opportunity. Do not think that I insert this for my own benefit, but more for the benefit of the cause. Last year I sent for some tracts to spread around, and I know they did good. If you send me anything, send such as will do good to persons that hav little faith in the church, but great faith in a God and a devil.

I approve of your proposed trip around the world, and wish I could help in that great work, but my means at present forbid. But if you and I liv until the book is printed, I shall hav it if there is any way to do so.

Last Friday we had a good entertainment. A Mr. Beaumont and his lady gave us some Spiritualistic performances. He showed us how Spiritualists fool the people. First he showed the trick, and then explained how it was done. Spiritualists were scarce here before, but I trust they are more so now.

Yours in the cause of truth, JOSEPH A. HELLETE.

A LITTLE DUST WANTED.

ST. JOHNS, MICH., March 30, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Some time since you said that you would like a general expression of opinion as to your contemplated trip around the world. Well, if you feel like it and can raise the funds, for one I say go, for the following reasons: 1. Macdonald will be able to giv us just as good a paper as you can; 2. You can write a history, an honest history, of your trip that will be interesting, and if the heathen in fact possess virtues equal or superior to Christians, you will not be afraid to treat them fairly and say so. And if you should chance to die, probably you may fall nto the hands of some god who will treat you better than would the Christians' God. But if you want to liv a life of sin, murder, rob, cheat, lie, and steal, you must try to get back before you die, for of all of the gods, there is not one that will save so mean a man and damn so good a one as will the Christians' God. If you will come in the eleventh hour (10:55 will do) that is all that's wanted. If you go, of course you will visit the garden where man got his first start. And I want you to bring me a bag of dust taken from the same knoll where God got the dust to make a man. Of course I havn't much faith, but if you will furnish the dust, I'll wet the dust and make a mud man, punch a hole up his nose, get on my knees and breathe in the hole, and if he becomes a living soul I'll let you know. But if he comes to life, jumps up, and says his stomach hankers after apples I'll giv him a bushel and tell him to go in, and I'll not damn him for eating and satisfying the cravings of the stomach that I hav made.

Yours truly, M. BABCOCK.

FREDERICA, IOWA, March 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: How pleasantly I hav spent the long winter evenings reading the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER! Amongst its entertaining qualities are the short articles of your many correspondents. Among them I see the names of Mrs. Anna M. Brooks, of Texas, and Mrs. M. E. Fisher, of Shell Rock, Iowa. I shall never forget the kind favor of Mrs. Fisher in giving me the loan of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which was the means of my conversion and confirmation in Materialism, thereby securing a subscriber to your paper as long as I can raise the amount to pay for it. I also see my friend Matthew Farrington proposes to giv $5.00 for books if you stay at home. In order to checkmate my friend Matthew I inclose $5.00 for the trip round the world, and hope you will go; if you do not I will hereafter order as to the $5.00. I think you are entitled to a six months' trip of pleasure if you can find it in travel, at least after a thirteen months' imprisonment. Yours truly, N. . MOORE.

SYLVANIA, O., March 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: "Better late than never." I wish sincerely to thank you for your European letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am familiar with many travelers, such as Taylor, Miller, etc., but you are the best delineator of places and countries that I ever knew.

Yours truly, M. JUDSON.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., March 5, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed is postal order for $4.00 to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Go on, brother, in the good work you are engaged in. Be faithful, and in time you must leave some of the old dogmas and superstitions pretty well shattered, so they can never stand so boldly out as before. Those who are in the work you are seemingly liv lives of battling, and you no doubt at times get weary in well-doing; but just as long as oppression in any way cries with a loud voice, so those opposed to it must cry louder still for liberty in all things, for a revolution is what is needed by us all.

I wish I had a "V" for you to help you in your trip around the world, but hav not this year. I know of no one who can do better in writing of what you will see than you; besides, it will add much to THE TRUTH SEEKER for all lovers of the truth.

True, it will be lonely for your companion in your absence, but I trust there will enough good come out of your trip to fill the want of your presence, that it will be returned to you both an hundredfold in the good you may receive.

May the love of truth ever guide you both in all things. Yours, MARY E. ROCKWELL.

PORTLAND, March 19, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I do not want to hear any more about your making a trip around the world. I am glad that you went to Europe, notwithstanding it was, in my opinion, an injury to your business. I want you to remain at your post and make THE TRUTH SEEKER a live paper, but if you leave your business and go round the world it will be the downfall of one of the best papers in the wide world.

H. A. LAMB, M. D.

[REPLY.—Should we make the projected journey, we hav full confidence that THE TRUTH SEEKER will remain just as good as it is now, and that our absence will not lead to a downfall of the paper unless our patrons become so totally indifferent as to not send in the material aid to keep the machinery running. The paper has readers enough to keep it up if those who read it will promptly remit when their time expires. If they do not do this it must go down whether we are at home or on the other side of the globe.—ED. T. S.]

PLATTSBURGH, N. Y., March 25, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find one dollar toward repairing the Paine monument at New Rochelle. He should hav a better one, and if every Liberal would donate one dollar the suggestion made in a late number of your paper could be carried out. Why not start a dollar subscription fund?

Yours, W. L. WEVER.

ST. LOUIS, March 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order for $15.70—50 cents for two copies of "The Besant-Hatchard Debate," 20 cents for two back numbers of your paper (two numbers are missing, and I am going to hav them bound for future reference, as the last volume contains the record of the inquisition and punishment of yourself when no crime had been committed—a disgrace to this nineteenth century), $5 for repairing Paine's monument, hoping the good Christians of our present day hav so far progressed that they will not again deface it. In January I wrote you that if you hould take a trip around the world I would be one of the three hundred to contribute $5 each for the expenses. I now recede from that promis. After reading the "Infidel Abroad" I feel that my library is not complete without the "Infidel at Home." I therefore send you ten dollars, and call upon all who hav proposed to giv five dollars to send you around the world to at once send the money and ask you to take a trip around our own country, and giv us a true history of cities, hamlets, and towns, customs, habits, and fashions, of our own people; a history of facts such as no other man but D. M. Bennett could write. When I peruse page after page of "An Infidel Abroad," I am filled with amazement and wonder how such an enormous work could hav been accomplished in so short a time, and it is still more astonishing how his physical and mental nature could bear up under such a tax. I believe, and am free to say, that the like has never been accomplished by any other man.

I will now say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that friend Bennett is getting well on in years, and I hav fears that so laborious a trip as is talked of would be too exhaustiv for one of his age. No, we cannot spare him; he needs his home and kind ones to administer to his every-day needs. We also need him here to edit this more than valuable paper, which grows better every week under his guidance, and I think any one who read his description of the Capitol and an account of the inaugural in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 12th will say with me that it is the best description they ever read of Washington or the Capitol of our country. Inhabitants, know thy country.

Now, friends, we hav no man of our age and day who can giv us so perfect a history of our own beloved America as can our dear friend Bennett. And now, dear friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, join with me, send in your five dollars or such money as you can spare, and let us hav an Infidel at home. I will welcome him to St. Louis, bestow upon him the hospitalities of my home without money and without price. I will assist him all I can, and I think he will find friends in other towns and cities that will do likewise, and should sickness come upon him he would not be in a foreign land among strangers who hav no interest or care for his welfare.

I also inclose my order to D. M. Bennett for two volumes of Infidel, one abroad and one at home, to be bound in best morocco, gilt edge.

Yours truly, A. F. GREEN.

[We return thanks to friend Green for his marked generosity. While we feel complimented with the estimate he places upon our personal efforts, we cannot help thinking that he overrates us. We hav little doubt that THE TRUTH SEEKER will be as well conducted in our absence as though we were here We shall not lightly throw aside his opinion or opinions, or those of others of our friends, but it is evident that we will not be able to please a about making the trip round the world, as a great number seem very anxious to hav us go, while several people desire us to remain at home. We will hav to decide the matter in a few weeks; if sufficient funds are provided we shall feel it our duty to giv the most satisfaction to the greatest number. We do not know what better we can do. If the funds are insufficient we will be very likely to tarry at home, whether the majority say so or not.—ED. T. S.]

CITY ISLAND, N. Y., March 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: As you invite an expression of the wishes of your friends respecting your tour of the world, I will improve the opportunity to record my vote in the negativ. In my opinion there are several reasons why you should not undertake such a journey. Perhaps the first and best reason is, you are wanted at home to do the work you are now doing. Your paper is acknowledged to be the most able and widely-circulated of all the Liberal papers published in this country, and its success depends in a great measure upon its editorial management. As its editor, you are the "right man in the right place." You do not need to go abroad for matter to fill its columns. Excellent as your letters from Europe were, I begrudged the space they occupied in THE TRUTH SEEKER, because they were not consonant with the object and aim of the paper.

The mission of your paper is necessarily a combativ one, and needs a fearless and energetic man at the helm.

Your paper has greatly improved since your return. You can do a great deal more for the Liberal cause by remaining at home and editing your paper than by going abroad.

Again, it seems to me that personal considerations should hav some weight in deciding the matter. You are far advanced in the journey of life, you hav had some rough experience during the last few years, and the comforts of home and the society of your many friends should be doubly dear to you and far outweigh the curiosity to see or the desire to visit other lands. Then the expense, the discomforts, the risks of traveling, are to be considered. Should you liv to return, the wear and tear of the journey would abridge a life already full of years and toil.

No; the friends who are prompting you to go abroad are selfish, I fear, and do not think of the fatigue, labor, isolation from friends, and other sacrifices such a journey will impose upon you. No, Mr. Bennett, remain at home, edit your paper, and thus help on the cause of mental emancipation.

Truly yours, C. A. BLEN.

CENTRAL, S. C., Mar. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see in the last TRUTH SEEKER that J. M. King, of Pennsylvania, has kindly sent to you fifty cents for my benefit. Please giv me credit and retain the amount; and if it is not asking too much of you, I would like to express my kind regards and high appreciation of the kindness of friend King. I only wish my few friends could know how thankful I feel for any and all such generous favors. For your noble and generous indulgence I am under lasting obligations, and at the same time let me not forget the names of B. Doscher and A. Keller, who hav kindly assisted me in this my time of need. Fraternally,

R. M. CASEY.

ALEDO, ILL., Mar. 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $4, for which you will please send your paper to the parties herein named.

I was just thinking this morning, as I was reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, what a grand thing it would be for you and for the advancement of Liberalism if each of your subscribers would send in three or four new ones. So I started out, and soon found three that agreed to take it a while on trial.

Yours, W. A. CABEEN.

AUBURN, N. Y., March 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The proposition in your last issue in relation to the new Paine monument—to be erected in Central Park or some other public grounds in New York city—is a grand and noble one, which ought to receive not only the unanimous approbation of every Liberal and Freethinker, but every American citizen, and more especially those acquainted with the nation's birth, a true knowledge of which must convince them of the indispensable services rendered by that brave and daring apostle of liberty who was the first to utter those startling words, "United States of America." Let not this proposition fail. For its consummation you may depend on my limited assistance to the amount of $1, at any rate, and more, if necessary, to be paid just as soon as the money is needed. Let every one respond according to his ability and before the close of 1883 we shall hav erected a monument which shall be one of the grandest things ever done by the advocates and defenders of universal mental liberty. Then shall the memory of our great hero take its proper place among the memories of the heroes of the world

Surely the services and logic of Thomas Paine are rapidly becoming crystallized in the minds of the American people. It is that ratio in which we as a people learn to form right opinions of ourselvs and our fellow-men and overcome our prejudices—which seem to be infused all through our sensibilities—that we love to revere the memory of such champions of liberty and freedom, thought and action, truth and justice—he who said, "Where liberty is not is the country for me."

I hope you may be privileged to publish the approval of thousands of others who will rapidly aid in contributing to this necessary work.

Yours for the glorious cause,
L. DeWitt Griswold.

Johnson's Creek, N. Y., March 20, 1881.

Editor of The Truth Seeker: The package of books you sent me are received. I hope to sell them all and many more, and will do my best to that end. I should like to get many subscribers for The Truth Seeker, for I think it is doing a noble work, and all Liberals who hav means ought to take it, but they are few in this section. If every one professing and possessing Liberal ideas were as earnest, persistent, and self-sacrificing as yourself in seeking and speaking what they consider the truth, the Freethought papers would be much better supported and its literature more extensivly circulated.

We hav been favored again with the presence and lectures of Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith, and it is evident by the largely increased audiences and profound attention with which they listened to the most radical utterances that the seeds of truth had taken good root and would in their time bring forth such fruit that superstition and errors would hav to find a more congenial soil.

With earnest wishes for the spread of truth and the prosperity of its dissemination, I remain

Yours truly, Emma Taylor.

Franklin, Ind., March 27, 1881.

Mr. Editor: This is a beautiful though a rather lonely day on account of business being suspended, so I thought I would drop you a few lines. I hav been omewhat interested in the letters with regard to the round-the-world trip, though I differ with most of them. I don't want you to go. In the first place, you hav caused me about all the trouble that I want you to. I spent many almost sleepless nights over you when you were in that damned, infernal, Comstock prison, and you know that a trip round the world would be attended with many dangers, and it is no little thing to be uneasy a whole year. I would like for you to hav the honor and pleasure of the toil if I could know that you would hav a safe voyage. But as I can't know that, I will give you $5 if you won't go, and I will giv you $5 if you do go, for I want the book.

I inclose $1 to help repair Paine's monument.

Piedra Canyon, Col., Jan. 15, 1881.

Friend Bennett: After a long silence the spirit again moves me to speak a word to you through the friends' columns. And that my communication may at least put on the semblance of originality, I will not begin my letter by congratulating you on your safe arrival at home, or by welcoming you to the Truth Seeker sanctum once more, but will preface my effusion by wishing every one of the readers of The Truth Seeker a happy New Year. You may think me a little late in extending my kind wishes, but better late than never, however, and of one thing you may rest assured, the wish is sincere. Many of you are personally known to me through the medium of the pen, and though I hav never met you face to face I feel almost as much attached to you as if I had always known you personally. Since writing last some changes hav stolen over the spirit of my dreams. I no longer keep lonely bachelor's hall, but hav a good Liberal family with me whom I induced to come out to Colorado to share with me some of the hardships and privations of frontier life, and to-night if some of you could see me snugly seated at a table in a commodious and comfortable cabin, surrounded by the latest papers, whilst on one side of the table a young lady sits and sews, and two bipeds of the male persuasion play cribbage on one end of the table, you would not think frontier life so very bad after all. But this is not what I started out to write about, but a very different matter. I hav recently had some very tough arguments with friends, intelligent, Liberal, and otherwise, in reference to the effects of the moon on this mundane sphere, and I find the odds greatly against me; indeed, the great majority may be said to be moonstruck. For my part I never saw any use for the moon except for moonlight strolls with your girl or a sleigh or buggy ride by your Maggie's side. I am not much of a planter, but the little I hav done in that line, I hav planted the seed in the earth and not in the moon; and notwithstanding my Dutch grandfathers' assurances to the contrary, the turnips sown on the light of the moon hav not invariably gone to top, and so far as my observations extend I hav failed to discover that the weather always changes with the moon, and if I am not mistaken, the leading scientists of the age are as skeptical on the moon question as myself. Indeed I remember reading, not many months since, a very able article from some scientist on this subject, in which he had the temerity to differ with the great majority in reference to the supposed influence of luna on this planet. He even went so far as to deny the moon's agency in producing the rising and falling tide. I am just as ready to discard this popular belief as I was revelation, the inspiration of the Bible, or other erroneous beliefs, but I find myself outnumbered in this contest, and without authorities to assist me in my fights against a moonsrtuck public I must go to the wall. Will some kind friend or friends giv me an opinion on the moon subject and quote some authorities on the subject? Indeed, if the idea that Proctor's old dead planet exercises a perceptible influence on our earth is a delusion, then let's hav light on this as well as other exploded theories. Yours for more and better moonlight.

J. Allen Evans.

Boonton, N. J., March 14, 1881.

Friend Bennett: Inclosed please find $5.25, which is for best frame and cabinet size picture of Col. Ingersoll, and the remainder to the fund for repairing Thomas Paine's monument.

Having read your notice in the last Truth Seeker of the pictures of the Colonel, I concluded that nothing could adorn the walls of my home more than the likeness of Col. R. G. Ingersoll. And to what should we contribute a little more willingly than to the fund for repairing Paine's monument? I do not believe a man ever lived who deserves a place in our memory and the lasting gratitude of all mankind more than Thomas Paine. And if every Liberal in the United States were to giv but one dime each, the work would soon be accomplished.

Fraternally yours, Philip Wootton.

Logan, Iowa, Feb. 14, 1881.

Friend Bennett: So long as The Truth Seeker has as good and interesting writers as hav filled its pages during the past two years, I am sure to want it continued. The discussions just now are quite entertaining reading, as we hav both sides in the same paper, very convenient for comparison. And then it is very satisfactory to a true Liberal, when the pimps of orthodoxy aim to say hard things about the Infidel Truth Seeker, to be able to show them that the very best of their writers and defenders hav full swing, so to speak, in its pages. If neither Mr. Hatchard, of London, nor Mr. Mair, in the current discussions, succeed in leading us captiv to their pretended system of faith in a God-nothing or Nothing-god, we ought to feel quite safe from danger of falling into the old ruts of superstition and error, for both of them seem to be well learned in the works of antiquity, and amply supplied with that which is most needed to support modern Christianity, to wit, boldness and audacity of assumption and presumption, claiming to hav knowledge, to know this and to know that, but always and ever failing to giv us proof at those points where proof is most needed, and still going on and on with a continned rehearsal of the same old, old claim of having knowledge. Mr. Mair says, "Christianity, on the contrary, to those who receive it, brings the only thing that can rest the conscienc nd bring peace and assurance to the heart—knowledge." Thus they always talk to us of knowledge, but ever fail to produce it. Having years ago experienced perhaps as much of this "peace and assurance" as the majority who "receive it," I hasten to assure Mr. Mair, according to his closing anecdote of the woman and Masonry, that I think I was ignorantly lying then, just as he is now in such assertions as the above; for when it comes to knowledge, that is just where they fail. Kindly yours,

D. W. B.

West Winfield, N. Y., March 3, 1881.

Friend Bennett: The Truth Seeker of Feb. 26th has more than its share of good reading. Mrs. Besant's summing up of the debate between A. Hatchard and herself shows that ability and intellect is vouchsafed to woman as well as man; that sex does not decide status of mind.

"Ingersoll Interviewed" is just grand. "Alamontada" can only be appreciated by people who hav suffered and are aspiring spiritually. "Liberal Bigotry" is most excellent. What a pity there are not more of the writer's opinion. Practically, C. S. Rowley is doing good. I am of his mind that there is not a paper published which is the compeer of The Truth Seeker. Thanks to George W. Morehouse for the resolutions that were adopted at the First Methodist Episcopal church of Syracuse, and his appropriate remarks thereon.

The repairing of Paine's monument is a most worthy object, yet that better be neglected than that our excellent brothers, Jeremiah Hacker, Daniel Tuttle, and others who hav stemmed the tide of prejudice and opposition in the past, should want for the comforts of life. I think it has been stated that Bro. Hacker and wife could be comfortable for life on $200. Who will be the one to bless him, and themselvs doubly so, by giving it? And also to send not only 10 cents, but $1.00 each, to Bro. Tuttle for a copy of the paper that he published 30 years ago. I once heard Mrs. Dr. Hallock say that she never gave to a poor person but what she felt to apologize to them; that if justice were meted out there would be no occasion for it. There are exceptions, we know, but there is much truth in her statement.

Pages 138 and 139 are replete with choice articles; and "Letters from Friends" are unusually good. I feel that it is just the copy to educate the people and particularly adapted to ministers. Please send one of that number to Elder Fen, Elder Jones, Lawyer Alesworth, S. S. Morgan, Leigh Hunt, Wm. T. Frenham, Myron A. McKee, Elder Kingsberg, and Deacon Phillips, all of this place.

Inclosed find $1.00 for the same, and postage due you on books.

Accept kindest wishes and extend the same to dear Mary. Yours, Ruth W. Briggs.

Trading Post, inn Co., Kan., Feb. 22, 1881.

Mr. Editor: I am glad to see your paper so much improved. The new dress is becoming; she wears it with such ease and grace that in fact she has become an indispensable appendage in our humble home. It is the cheapest paper among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely. On its bright pages are found many sparkling gems of thought and grand and lucid reasonings that would convert the world and turn them from the error of their ways to embrace pure and undefiled Liberalism if all could be induced to read and exercise their reasoning faculties for themselvs instead of paying some ignoramus to think for them.

Mr. Bennett, among the many things I would wish to say is, many thanks to you for continuing our paper after our time had expired, for I hav been very sick this winter. Since I hav been able to sit up and read you cannot imagin how eagerly I looked for the weekly visits of your soul-cheering paper.

Your letters from Europe hav been a source of much pleasure and profit to the many readers of your paper.

I hope you will make the trip around the world and giv us a description of all the old cathedrals and castles and pyramids and monasteries. Visit all of the sacred and holy places. Please don't forget the tomb of Adam and the inscription on his tombstone; likewise the resting-place of Noah and Moses and the sepulcher wherein Christ descended into hell. Don't forget while on your way to Sodom to search diligently for Lot's wife. If you could find Mrs. Lot and claim her by right of discovery and import her to your home in New York, would not she be a bonanza though? Hundreds of thousands of believers in the divine inspiration of the old Jewish fables would call at your office and pay a dollar for the privilege of seeing and admiring the beautiful female specimen that Jehovah miraculously preserved just to demonstrate the fact that the potter has power over the clay. There are many other ancient relics, which, if you can gain possession of them, your fortune is assured.

If you go around the world I hope you will enjoy yourself and take your time, for we wish you a long life and a happy one.

Inclosed find $3, which will help to keep the machine moving and frighten the wolf away from the sanctum sanctorum from whence we obtain our weekly supply of mental pabulum to cheer us on and make us strong in the ways of truth and liberty. Long may The Truth Seeker liv and flourish; may its seething influence pervade every mind within the limits of civilized society; may it improve in the future as in the past. More cannot be expected or desired. May the number of its grand and brilliant contributors never be less. May its editor and all connected with the management thereof never grow old, and may Elmina, T. C. Lee, Eugene, and all the sanctified host never feel the want of friends. Amen.

Truckee, Cal., March 12, 1881.

Mr. Editor: A pious brother has recently discovered the cause of the floods in California. Thinking it might be of interest to your readers, I inclose the "clipping" for publication. Cordially yours,

E. G. Cory.

"THE FLOODS A DIVINE JUDGMENT.

"A writer of the San Francisco Pacific Methodist has ascertained to his own entire satisfaction that the disastrous floods which hav recently occasioned so much loss and suffering in different parts of the country hav been sent upon us as a divine judgment for giving so kind a reception to Ingergoll and Bernhardt, who are for good and sufficient reasons supposed to be greatly out of favor with the celestial powers. Mr. Smith, after describing the melancholy condition of things in his district—'business stagnant, merchants idle, churches closed, gloom everywhere'—says: 'And now comes the news that New Orleans is flooded, and Sacramento under the waters too. We hav waxed fat and kicked, and now the goad must be used. When Sara Bernhardt draws a $4,000 house in so small a city as Atlanta, Ga., and Bob Ingersoll is heard with delight in so many large and small towns, is it any wonder that chastisment falls?' Brother Smith does not enter upon the inquiry, Why is it that the cities which hav been the chief offenders are spared?"

To a Dead Infidel.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Brave spirit, fronting life and death,
With soul serene and high;
No clouds of fear within thy mind,
Disdaining false reply;
Ready to take the life that is,
And its deep secret find;
The secret that pure knowledge givs,
Not fancy unconfined.

Thou scornest death, yet calm death givs
New glory to thy life;
Makes it no shadow, but a fire,
With hope's warm splendor rife;
Not that thou livest in new sphere,
But that thy truth abides,
And every honest act flows on
In this world's deathless tides.

The wide soul of the race takes up
The flame within thy breast;
'Tis not extinguished in the dust;
It thrills us at its best;
No strain is lost, the music still
Sweeps on in human weal;
Thy grave is but the viewless key
When a new throb we feel.

I'm Going to Roam the Woods.

BY J. R. MONROE.

I'm going to roam the woods to-day
For wild flowers for my deary,
I want her brow to look more gay,
Her bonnie eye more cheery.

She wears a sad and anxious air
As if her heart were pining;
Therefore wild pinks and roses rare
In golden ringlets twining

Will giv her saddened face more cheer,
Her bonnie eye will brighten,
And thrilling whispers in her ear
Her heavy heart may lighten.

With spirit fingers will I twine
Fresh rose-buds in her tresses,
With spirit voice breathe loves of mine,
Which soul-communion blesses,

And thus with mystic spirit power
(The brooking distance illy),
I'll thrill with love my passion-flower,
I'll cheer my drooping lily.

She is my cedar on the mount,
My lily in the valley,
My dove-eyed fawn beside the fount,
The sprite with which I sally

On spirit wings forth into dreams
(When night flings down her curtain)
Into that death with life that seems
Half real, dim, uncertain.

But now for her, with fleur-de-luce,
With spirit-woven story,
With garlands spirit-formed for use,
I'll deck her brow in glory.

Bathsheba's Toilet for the Harem.

BY ALHAZA.

"Twine my dark hair with jewels to-night,
To glow and gleam 'neath the witching light;
Bring Persian tissues all pale and sweet
With the waxen hue of a winding-sheet,
Lighted with gems like the dews of spring,
To ravish the bosom of Israel's king.

"I go in splendor, I go in tears,
My lord disdaineth to soothe my fears;
His brave heart burneth, his steps are fleet,
To kiss the ground at the monarch's feet
Whose diadem glistens with pearls and gold,
I die eftsoons in his serpent fold!

"These perfumed flowers no grief hav known,
They deepen my sighs to a sobbing moan;
Bring funeral roses and robes of doole,
The night wind whispereth faint and cool;
A flashing crown, will it soothe my blood
Or ease my brow in its tortured mood?"

"Bring her, ye slaves, for I see her stand,
As spirits weep on a far-off strand;
Her throbbing bosom heaves for me
The scented sigh of the champac tree;
Her dark eye hideth its tale of love,
With the downcast pride of a snowy dove.

"She strayeth silent, she weepeth lone,
But I will awake her with music's tone;
She lieth mute by the waters cool,
Her beauty shrouded in robes of doole.
Haste, idle slaves, or my heart will break,
I faint and famish for her sweet sake."

For Religion's Sake.

BY OLD VIRGINIA.

"No God but one!" For this the sage
The poison cup must drain;
"More worlds than one!" and Bruno dies
A martyr in the flame.
Learned Theron's daughter's gifted queen,
Of love by sages taught,
The victim of religious fiends,
As classic halls she sought.

Vanini, brave Italian, saw
And knew no Hebrew God.
Unflinching to the stake was bound,
And proudly scorned the rod.
The torture, Galileo's fate,
Who made an eye for heaven,
And Campanella doth await
The torture two times seven.
Servetus in the snare was caught
By demon Calvin set,
And slowly roasting hour by hour,
"In fire his white face set."

And more than these 'twere long to tell
How in religion's name there fell
The best, the noblest sons of earth,
Before and since Messiah's birth.

THE LITTLE GIANT

POCKET SCALES.

The Greatest Invention of the Age. Something for Everybody.

A new invention of rare merit, which must not be classed with the cheap, miserable affairs that are now flooding the country. "THE LITTLE GIANT POCKET SCALE" is a neat and useful article, which, in time, will throw all the old, fogy scales and balances into the shade. They weigh ACCURATELY from one ounce to eight pounds. Carefully built and constructed by skilful workmen, they will giv the best satisfaction wherever introduced. For beauty and workmanship they take the lead. Heavily plated with nickel silver, they cannot tarnish or rust. These scales are so small and portable that they can be easily carried in the vest pocket, and occupies no more space than a small pocket-knife. These scales are durable, strong, and accurate, and, with ordinary usage, will last a lifetime without getting out of order, as they are built upon an entirely new principle, which the inventor spent nearly two years in perfecting. They are pronounced by Ned Buntline (E. Z. C. Judson) and other leading American sportsmen to be superior to any scale heretofore imported from Europe, and they should be seen to be appreciated. Just the thing for Sportsmen, Trappers, Hunters, Agents, Travelers, and Family use; in fact "Something for Everybody." No dealer in the world can giv you a scale equal to the "LITTLE GIANT" for five times the price asked. The pattern is neatly constructed and finely finished. Every scale we send out is in perfect order, and is warranted so or money refunded every time. Satisfaction guaranteed in every case. These SCALES are no "CATCHPENNY" affair, but something both good and useful to every person in the Land.

AGENTS WANTED

Everywhere to sell these SCALES in all sections of the country, as you will find them the fastest-selling article on record. "BIG DISCOUNTS" are offered to agents, dealers, and the trade. Our motto is, "Liv and Let Liv," "Quick Sales and Small Profits." Circulars, terms, and full particulars sent free to any address. One sample SCALE, put up in a neat case, sent by mail to any address on receipt of 50 cents. (3-cent postage stamps taken, or you can send a ONE DOLLAR BILL and we will send three SCALES.)

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable! DOCTOR FELLOWS You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.
Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.
Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.
Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.
Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection to all classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.
NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.
JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blundcrheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murd-rers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain neccssitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful considcration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DeT. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DeT. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate frieuds, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Associatiou for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH.

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a scvere bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very snsceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully woru by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your commou sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any beuefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

SET it down to thyself as well to create good precedents as to follow them.—Bacon.

HOPE springs eternal in the human breast;
Man never is, but always to be blest.
—Pope.

WE never liv, but we hope to liv; and always preparing ourselvs to be happy, it follows inevitably that we never are so.—Pascal.

RELIGION, they tell us, ought not to be ridiculed, and they tell us truth; yet surely the corruptions in it may, for we are taught by the tritest maxim in the world that religion being the best of things, its corruptions are likely to be the worst.—Swift's Tale of a Tub.

How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute,
And a perpetual feast of nectared sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns.
—Milton's Comus.

PART of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.—James Parton.

SHEPHERD, I take thy word
And trust thy honest offered courtesy,
Which oft is sooner found in lowly sheds
With smoky rafters than in tapestry hall
And courts of princes, where it first was named
And yet is most pretended. —Milton's Comus.

THERE is a vast difference between laughing at religion and laughing at those who profane it by their extravagant opinions. It were impiety to be wanting in respect for the verities which the spirit of God has revealed; but it were no less impiety of another sort to be wanting in contempt for the falsities which the spirit of man opposes to them. —Pascal's Letters.

IT will ever be the characteristic of choice souls to prefer the mournful nobility of the prerogativs of genius, with all their accompanying trials, to the jollity and mirth on a mere vulgar level. In their view pleasure may be a rose, but wisdom is a ruby. With a thrill of divine valor they affirm that the duty to be noble takes precedence of the right to be happy.—W. R. Alger.

LUTHER would not permit much speculativ liberty. The suspension of judgment, on which modern science insists, he would hav denounced as doubt—as a temptation of the devil. The obstinate questionings of unseen things, which makes Shakspere's plays so free and human, never sounded in his ears, or, if they did, were dismissed with a text from scripture.—Cornhill Magazine.

IT is the obvious law of divine providence, it is and has been a great law of human progress, that truth shall not be flashed upon the mind at once, either in religion or in any other of the great fields of interest and occupation to man, but that it shall be conquered and won through the medium of gradual and slow approach, even in the midst and by the help of misunderstanding and error.—G. Vance Smith.

FITNESS and unfitness are the ultimate ideas that underlie the terms right and wrong. These last are metaphorical terms: right, rectus, straight, upright, according to rule, and therefore fit; wrong, wrung, distorted, twisted out of place, abnormal, and therefore unfit. We are so constituted that we cannot help regarding fitness with esteem and complacency; unfitness with disesteem and disapproval, even though we ourselvs create it or impersonate it.—A. P. Peabody.

THERE is no real evidence of talking serpents or trees of knowledge. Still these things are taught our children as facts, and religions foster the belief, while the Bible furnishes the texts. Therefore as I deem it my mission to do all I can to extirpate error and sow the seeds of truth, I shall do my level best to destroy a belief in this book which has so long been the curse of the world. Why, the "Iroquois Indian Stories" are as harmless as Mother Goose's melodies in comparison with it.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THE soul admits of a twofold division, one of which partakes of reason, the other is without it. When, therefore, we are ordered that we giv a law to ourselvs, the meaning is that reason should restrain our rashness. There is in the soul of every man something soft, low, enervated in a manner, and languid. Were there nothing besides this, men would be greatest of monsters; but there is present to every man reason, which presides over and givs laws to all; and this reason, by improving itself and making continual advances, becomes perfect virtue.—Cicero.

MANY of the world's intellectual benefactors hav been martyrs. Socrates died in prison as a public malefactor. For the healing wisdom he offered his people deadly poison was the reward. . . . Plato traveled back and forth from his home in Athens to the court of the Syracusan tyrant, regarded indeed and feared, but persecuted and in peril of life; nay, and once sold for a slave. Cicero shared a worse fate. Dante all his life knew, as he expressed it,

"How salt was a stranger's bread,
How hard the path still up and down to tread
A stranger's stairs." —Orville Dewey.

NOTHING was too daring for Pascal to utter if only it appeared to him to be true. Of truth, whatever it was, he felt an imperious need, and to speak it forth without compromise and without reserve was his overmastering impulse. It was this frank conscientiousness, this ardor for the exact truth, which made his mode of expression, his literary style, so singularly real and pure—so accurately true to the thought; it could tolerate no superfluity, no circumlocution, no ambiguous vagueness; it was, as Faugere says, "the thought itself clothed like an antique statue [I tremble while I transcribe the words lest Sir Anthony Comstock should burst into my lonely garret] with its own chaste nudity."—Quarterly Review.

Odds and Ends.

"ONE good turn deserves another," as the man said when he turned the organ-grinder out of the front yard.

AN English traveler in the Holy Land, it is said, has discovered Jacob's well. There has been a rumor afloat that Jacob was dead.

BE thankful you are poor. You will not hav the trouble of crawling out from under a heavy monument on the resurrection morning.

"Now this is what I call business," remarked a Brooklyn undertaker, as an unfortunate gentleman stepped into his store and died.

"PUT upon my tombstone," said the dying man "an epitaph stating that I was a scoundrel, thief and brute. Then people will think I was a good man. Epitaphs always lie so."

CHANGED HIS RELIGION.

"I'll be dinged ef I doan b'l'eve in de predespernation doctrin," remarked Wooly Calvin, the preacher, to a party of brethren.

"On what fabricationment ob theoreticalism do yer place de sinews ob yer ratiossination?" asked Toney, the philosopher.

"Gimmy dem words so I ken committal dem to understandin', Toney," requested Calvin, turning with a beseeching expression.

"No, sir," said the philosopher, with emphasis. "I got my larnin' by de sweat of my brow at a night school ober a libery stable, an' I don't purpose ter gin it away fur nothin'. When I flings out anythin' an' yer ken ketch hit, all right; but doan ax me ter make yer a present ob my incyclopedia."

"Scuze me, Toney, I didn't tend to rob yer. But as to dat predespernation business. In my church, fur I's a pizen Mefodest, I hez al'ers faut dat doctrin. Now, I ez been 'vinced ob hit an' will hab ter change my 'ligion. I'll tell yer how I was 'vinced. Yisterday mornin', when I cum along down de street, I thought dis way ter myself; 'Now,' sez I, 'ef hit is tended fur me ter get drunk ter day, I'se ur gwine ter do hit.'"

"Wall, how did that prube de doctrin ob predespernation?"

"I got drunk!"—Little Rock Gazette.

A TRUTHFUL MAN.

A flat-footed, old-fashioned Western merchant, hailing from a country store in Michigan, was buying stock in New York recently, and the firm took advantage of the occasion to make inquiries concerning some of their customers around him. When they asked about Smith, of Cashville, he replied:

"Smith? Yes, he's in the trade yet, but he's just married a second wife, and she's going through his wealth like saltpeter. He'll fail in less'n six months."

"How about Jones, of your town?"

"Jones? Well Jones is pegging along after the old style, but he bought him a bicycle, and everybody says he'll go to the wall in a year."

"And Brown & Son—are they all right?"

"Brown & Son? Well, yes, they may keep along until spring, but I doubt it. Old Brown has got so near-sighted that he can't tell a sheep-pelt from a coon-skin, and the boy is dead stuck on a widow who never wears anything less than six-dollar stockings."

"But Davis is doing a good business, isn't he?"

"Davis? Well, pooty fair, but he won't last. He rented the upper part of his store to a Chicago milliner, and she broke up two families and caned a minister. Everybody blamed Davis, and his sales last week only footed up to a pound of saleratus and a washboard."

"Well, you are our only other customer out there, and, of course, you are all right."

"Me? Well, I'm all right just now, but things may change. My wife belongs to three literary societies, and is the big gun at church festivals, while I've bought a two-forty trotter and learned to play old sledge. You needn't be surprised any day this winter to hear I've been busted from garret to cellar, so clean that the creditors won't find enough dry goods to wipe a baby's nose on."

WHERE THE DIFFERENCE MODESTLY CAME IN.

A certain gentleman requiring legal assistance had been recommended to one of two brothers, but had forgotten the first name of him he sought, so he called at the office of the one first found and asked for Mr. Podger.

"That is my name, sir."

"But there are two of you of that name here in town?"

"Yes."

"Well, I wish to consult the Mr. Podger—excuse me for the allusion—who wears a wig."

"We both wear wigs, sir."

"Well, the man I seek was divorced from his wife not long ago."

"There you hit us both again, sir."

"The man to whom I was recommended has recently been accused of forgery, but I trust unjustly."

"There we are again, my dear sir. We hav both had that gentle insinuation laid at our doors."

"Well, upon my word, you two brothers bear a striking resemblance. But I guess I hav it now. The one I am after is in the habit of occasionally drinking to excess—sometimes to intoxication."

"My dear man, that little vice is unfortunately characteristic of the pair of us, and I doubt if our best friends could tell you which was the worst."

"Well, you are a matched pair, certainly. But tell me," continued the visitor, "which of the twain it was that took the poor debtor's oath a few months ago?"

"Ha, ha, we were both in that muddle. I was on Bob's paper, and he on mine."

"In mercy's name," cried the applicant, desperately, "will you tell me which is the most sensible man?"

"Ah, there you touch bottom, my friend. Poor Bob, I can't stretch the truth, even to serve a brother. If you want the more sensible one of the two, I suppose I must acknowledge the corn. I'm the man."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 8. No. 16. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, April 16, 1881. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

TWELVE bodies hav thus far been cremated at Washington, Pa. Five of them were sent from this city.

THE 17th of May is now announced as the date when the revised New Testament may be expected to appear.

PROF. DAVID SWING says in his paper, the Alliance, that "unless Unitarianism evokes real spirituality, it will die of dry rot."

THE Rev. William Thomas preaches to a colored congregation in Washington on Sundays, and during the rest of the week is employed as door-tender for a gambling-house.

A WOMAN writes to the Cincinnati Enquirer that she doesn't like the Russian bath because she "can't see the fun of being laid on a marble slab and scrubbed, kneaded, slapped, and dented from head to foot by a woman so stalwart that one can't quite get rid of the suspicion that she is a man in disguise."

THE terribly destructiv earthquake at Chio and simultaneously the most serious inundation of the century at Seville, following closely upon the earthquakes in Austria, and with the war-clouds lowering in the East, are incidents that may disturb those who still hav secret fear of the prediction that the year 1881 would be one of portents and terrors.

GEN RAILLTON, the five-foot commander of the Salvation Army, stepped off at Halifax from the steamer in which he had started from Europe, and failed to get back aboard in time. Being thus left in Halifax, he declared that Providence had so ordered it for the salvation of the city. He undertook the job at once, but the hootings and missils of a mob compelled him to stop.

THE struggle which has for some time been raging among the brethren of the Washington Avenue Baptist church in Brooklyn has now culminated in victory for Pastor Haynes. The particular point on which the war was waged was the election of deacons. The general strife has been between the people who wanted Pastor Haynes to stay and those who were desirous to be rid of him.

APROPOS of the recent great fire in Paris, a correspondent of the Figaro offers the following advice: "In disasters of this kind one should proceed with the strictest order and method. Accordingly, one will first of all save the children, who are the future; the women, who are the present; the old men, who are the experience; then the furniture; and, if there is time, the collateral relations and the mothers-in-law!"

IT is well known that certain fowls fill their digestiv apparatus with gravel and pebbles, which act as millstones in grinding up their food. Recent investigation shows that other animals are addicted to similar habits on a larger scale. Seals swallow stones weighing from one to two and sometimes even three pounds each, while one investigator found, not long since, ten pounds of these boulders in the stomach of a sea lion.

THE report of the Rev. J. Milum's visit to Abomey shows that the "custom" of human sacrifices still prevail in Dahomey. Mr. Milum is the general superintendent of the Wesleyan Mission station in the Yoruba and Popo districts of West Africa. During the missionary's stay the annual "customs" were being held at Abomey. These were of the most horrible description, several hundred nativs being killed in the most barbarous manner and offered in sacrifice.

A VERMONT clergyman makes the future of good Christians clear by saying: "After crossing the mystic river we shall go on from the man to the angel, from the angel to the archangel, from the archangel to the celestial, from the celestial to the divine, and then, gathering the stars in clusters about our heads, dream out the endless dream of eternity." It would seem that after all these promotions we ought to be able to set up for gods and engage in the occupation of making worlds out of nothing, and then people them with candidates for hell.

IN the San Jose Valley, New Mexico, for thirty miles or more the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe railroad track lies along what is probably one of the largest lava flows in the world. There it has lain for ages, in some places piled up in masses of huge blocks to a hight of twenty feet, and in others preserving the form it had when, a molten stream, it poured down the valley, burying beneath its fiery mass every obstacle that lay within its course. The old crater whence this vast bed of lava flowed is to be seen about eight miles to the north of Bluewater.

IN 1307 the Jewish residents of the city of Rouen were driven into exile, their property confiscated, and on the place where their synagog stood a building was erected for the officers and machinery of the holy Inquisition. A book just published in Rouen says that a lineal descendant of one of the banished Jews is M. Felix, a councilor at the Court of Appeals, now sitting in that city, and that the court, where he has a seat on the bench, holds its sessions in the building formerly belonging to the Inquisition, and on the spot where before that the ancient synagog had stood. These facts are recorded as illustrating the strange coincidences that the whirligig of time brings about.

THE Salvation Army finds its hymns very popular among the rough classes in London who attend the meetings in that city. Learned hymnologists might not fancy these hymns, either as aids to devotion or as specimens of choice English. One of the most popular metrical expressions of antipathy toward the great enemy of souls is found in such a verse as this:

"The devil and me we can't agree;
I hate him and he hates me;
He had me once, but he let me go;
He wants me again, but I don't mean to go.

"The publicans are crying out
Because the mission is going about;
But still about we mean to go
And rout the devil and every foe."

A GROWING indifference to religious services is noted in England as well as here. The Rev. Newman Hall says there is throughout that country a diminishing attendance on public worship. "As a rule," he adds, "in our large towns skilled artisans ignore our ecclesiastical arrangements. I do not say they are aggressivly hostil or ostensibly Infidel, but they are indifferent to our ordinary public services. As a class they do not go to church. To a large extent this is true also among the upper ranks of fashion, wealth, and intellect." He regrets, too, that a majority of English church-goers content themselvs with the morning service on Sunday, leaving the churches almost empty in the evening.

THE cable brings the intelligence that Mr. Bradlaugh was, on the 8th inst., re-elected to a seat in Parliament from which he was recently unjustly removed by his bigoted, intolerant, Christian opponents by virtue of an antiquated law which was dug up for the occasion. The canvass appears to hav been a very lively one, the Rev. Mr. Varley, a Baptist clergyman of London, a sensational preacher and imitator of Spurgeon, lending his services to divide the Liberal vote with Mr. Bradlaugh, besides the opposition of Col. Moreland, the regular Conservativ candidate. The contest was hot and acrimonious, but Mr. Bradlaugh put forth his well-known powers both in speaking and in private canvassing. He was also bravely seconded by his colleague, Mr. Henry Labouchere, editor and publisher of Truth, who enjoys great popularity in Northampton. This support was of essential service to Mr. Bradlaugh. The latter will present himself before the house at an early day, and it is understood that he will not further object to the taking of the oath which the law prescribes. His admission will undoubtedly be strongly opposed by the intolerant bigots, who will use every means in their power to prevent the taking of his seat by the great Atheist. They will urge that not having changed his views since his refusal to take the oath his conscience will not be bound by an oath, and that his having been expelled are sufficient grounds why he should not again be admitted. Mr. Bradlaugh will not tamely yield the contest, and will use every laudable means to secure the seat to which he has the second time been elected; and it is believed, notwithstanding the opposition which he will receive from his Christian enemies, that he will triumph over them at last.

AT the session of the New York East Conference recently Bro. Talmage sat among the preachers, smiling, nodding to acquaintances, and looking as jolly a Methodist as any of them. He seemed much interested in the business under discussion, which was the determination what to do with an elderly brother who had been suspended once or twice from the ministry for what the Rev. Dr. Buckley described as a constitutional proclivity to petty meannesses and irregularities. The debate was cut short by a motion to postpone the further consideration of the brother's case until Monday. While the Rev. Dr. Curry and Dr. Buckley were exchanging sarcasms, Bro. Talmage was observed to throw his head back and gaze dreamily at the ceiling. Perhaps for the moment he fancied himself back again in the court with the holy name, listening to the Christian outpourings of Spear and VanDyke.

A VISION OF TO-DAY.

O fair Ohio, on thy fertil plains
How grow great booming crops of massiv brains,
And little consulates beyond the sea,
And Treasury desks at home but sprout for thee!
Where the post-office woos the cool March air,
Thy voice and hand, Ohio man, are there.
For thee the sutlership bursts into bloom;
For thee alone the presidential boom;
For thee the Claims Commission opens its gates;
For thee the little clerkship smiling waits;
For thee the vacant bench impatient stands;
For thee wait agencies of Indian lands;
For thee all offices of every grade;
For thee all vacancies that can be made.
Flowers hav their time to fade, and le[illegible] to fall—
All things and seasons thine; thou hast 'em all.

R. B. HAYES.

A SERIES of small charts representing the condition of the sun's disk on every fair day since Jan. 1st, shows many remarkable coincidences that might be taken as corroborativ proof of the existence of an intimate relation between sun spots and the weather. Before the violent storms that hav already made this one of the most remarkable years in meteorological annals these charts show that there has almost invariably been an unusual outbreak of disturbing forces in the sun. There are great differences, however, in the time elapsing between the displays of solar energy and the outbreak of storms on the earth. Sometimes it is only a week; sometimes two or three weeks. Certainly such coincidences, by themselvs, prove little; but taken in connection with many other well-established facts, they help to show that Herschel was not so far wrong after all when he traced a connection between sun spots and the price of breadstuffs. Only two or three weeks remain in which Venus can be studied in her most beautiful form as an evening star. No one who can command the use of a telescope of any kind should fail to see this charming planet in its crescent form. When the early astronomers were able to show that Venus presented the phases of the moon, they soon silenced the enemies of the Copernican system. A boy's spyglass will now show what it required all the skill of Galileo to discover.

News of the Week.

Liberty and Purity: How to Secure Both Safely, Effectively, and Impartially.

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON CHARITABLE AND RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES OF THE ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK IN OPPOSITION TO A BILL TO LARGELY INCREASE THE CRIMINAL JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE, MARCH 23, 1881.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN, OF THE BAR OF NEW YORK.

CONTINUED.

This statement of this Agent will once more enable you to measure the extent of his credibility, for there is not a word of truth in it. It is a total, absolute, unmitigated falsehood. Every word of this book was written and the materials for it were collected and prepared by Mr. Bennett himself, and by him only. His affidavit to that effect I will produce, but his peculiar style, which no one can imitate, shows it at once. Mr. Bennett has nothing whatever to do with abortions or attempts at murder, and when this Agent recklessly so states before you, he gives a correct measure of himself and of the value of his accusations. Neither is that book a collection of falsehoods. It was written under a bias, of course, but also under the threat and expectation of prosecution by this agent therefor, and the Author was therefore exceedingly careful to put down nothing but what he could prove in a court of justice.

In the course of acquiring some knowledge of the methods of this society, several of these cases have been investigated by me, and some for me, and I have no doubt of the general correctness of this record. The Agent is always profuse in courting investigation, but only at his office and on his side of the story. The side that the victim can only present out of his office is equally important. When the other side is heard, there remains a career of falsehood, "cruelty, and crime" that no fair, honest, merciful citizen will ever ask you to continue in his name. No, Mr. Agent, this record was not written by an abortionist or would-be murderer, and it is too true—too true for you to stand with it before an honest man, to say nothing of a just and yet merciful God. It proves that it is not safe to leave irresponsible power, and, least of all, an irresponsible oath, in your hands.

No, it is not safe to displace the secular officers of the law for these religious sensationalists. It will not be "free America" when it is done. The man does not live who can be trusted with irresponsible power.

And of all powers, that of the initiation of criminal prosecution for the class of offenses placed under the charge of these amateur societies is the most delicate and dangerous possible. The idea of giving the agents of these societies the power to arrest in any county on the mere irresponsible permission of any sheriff, and without warrant! Of passing over to them the power to control the police of the state to aid them in the execution of these laws by arrest, without any warrant or indictment whatever!

At common law no man, not actually committing crime, can be arrested for a crime except upon the indictment of a jury of his vicinage, or by a warrant upon affidavit that he was committing a crime necessary to be stopped, or was about to flee from justice. The accusation before the grand jury is to be kept secret unless the indictment is obtained and the arrest is made. It is this privacy of accusation that has been one of the great benefits of the grand jury system since the origin of the common law.

It is not safe to lay these bulwarks of individual liberty in the dust before the irresponsible, biased, sensation-mongering, contribution-hunting agents of these societies.

IS IT EFFECTIVE?

Secondly. This method of amateur enforcement of the laws is not EFFECTIVE.

It is a sensational pretense in the beginning and in the end a delusion and a snare.

1. In theory, the motive of interest upon which it rests is at bottom wrong. It has been well said that it is a method to manufacture crime, and punish crime by the use of crime. It is thrice accursed in its motive, means, and results.

These societies would find their occupation gone were the offenses to cease. They always scotch the snake, never kill it. Torture, not the end of vice, is what they are after. The greater the agony, the greater the collection and the salaries, and the importance of all the "great and pious men" concerned. Instead of breaking up the establishments of vice in a fair, legal, and manly way, this resort to trickery merely causes them to change hands to elude it by still sharper trickery. An occasional raid or arrest amounts to little. Nor do the society agents really care. When the poulterer slays all of his flock at once, these societies can afford to destroy all of the vice from which they feed and live.

2. Again, their use of falsehood and crime as their method is demoralizing to the community, and especially to themselves and the offenders. It destroys all truth, confidence, and morality in the people. Unless the government respects and obeys the laws of morality it is useless to ask or expect the governed to do so. The stream will not rise higher than its source in the laws themselves. Jesuitism, or the government by falsehood, begets a community of liars and hypocrites. Better a hundred times change the laws of evidence so as to make it perfectly easy for the officers of the law to convict in any case, than to resort to lying.

It was a sad sight when one of the principal clergymen of New York and the Chancellor of her University stood up at the anniversary of this society in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, February 16, 1880, and advocated falsehood as a mode of government in these words: "Deceiving them! I tell you, gentlemen, I believe in deceit. I believe in deceit whenever you have got a rightful enemy to destroy. Could you carry on a war without deceit? Are you to tell your enemy everything you are going to do? Whenever you have a rightful enemy, and have a right UNDER GOD to destroy him, you have a right to deceive him."

As long as the flower of our liberally-educated youth are sent out with this code of morals, what can you expect of the rest of the community? It was the necessities of these societies that introduced that novelty in morals. A society that has such a necessity has no right to exist.

The proper comment upon such morality and necessity has been given by the Rev. Sydney Smith in referring to a similar society in London. Let this clergyman fully dispose of the other. He says:

"It is hardly possible that a society for the suppression of vice can ever be kept within the bounds of good sense and moderation. If there are many members who have really become so from a feeling of duty, there will necessarily be some who enter the society to hide a bad character, and others whose object it is to recommend themselves to their betters by a sedulous and bustling inquisition into the immoralities of the public. The loudest and noisiest suppressors will always carry it against the more prudent part of the community; the most violent will be considered as the most moral; and those who see the absurdity will, from the fear of being thought to encourage vice, be reluctant to oppose it. . . . Beginning with the best intentions in the world, such societies must, in all probability, degenerate into a receptacle for every species of tittle-tattle, impertinence, and malice. Men whose trade is rat-catching love to catch rats; the bug-destroyer seizes on his bug with delight; and the suppressor is gratified by finding his vice. The last soon becomes a mere tradesman like the others; none of them moralize, or lament that their respective evils should exist in the world. The public feeling is swallowed up in the pursuit of a daily occupation and in the display of a technical skill. An informer, whether paid by the week, like the agents of this society, or by the crime, as in common cases, is in general a man of a very indifferent character. So much fraud and deception are necessary for carying on his trade—it is so odious to his fellow-subjects—that no man of respectability will ever undertake it. It is evidently impossible to make such a character otherwise than odious. A man who receives weekly pay for prying into the transgressions of mankind, and bringing them to consequent punishment, will always be hated by mankind, and the office must fall to the lot of some man of desperate fortunes and ambiguous character. If it be lawful for respectable men to combine for the purpose of turning informers, it is lawful for the lowest and most despicable race of informers to do the same thing; and then it is quite clear that every species of wickedness and extortion would be the consequence."

3. But, practically, how does the system work? We answer that as to the laws and offenses in question it displaces the officers of the law and renders them incompetent or useless, and yet it is not effective.

We know that this whole line of legislation has been justified or excused, as Lynch law would be, because of the alleged insufficiency of the secular police and magistrates. We believe that the charges of this kind have been greatly exaggerated by the advocates of this legislation to attain the committal of these powers to them. We remember that the insufficiency of the temporal government has ever been the cry and excuse for resorts to ecclesiastical law, Lynch law, and every other unrepublican form of government. The trouble is that the remedy is worse than the disease, and finally replaces the trouble by a worse one, which grows the more it is appealed to. Power grows by what it feeds upon. Every year you will be asked for more.

There is but one cure for official insufficiency or neglect: that is personal responsibility and summary removal from office. If one official won't do the work, let the Governor take him out and put in one who will. It is a kind of mean and cowardly treason to despair of the republic in this petty way. It is pitiable to send the great State of New York among her religious sects and amateur societies to take up collections to enforce her laws. Before you let us descend further in that direction let us try what personal responsibility can do under the Governor's weeding hand.

An officer so selected will represent the power, authority, and moral influence of the great State of New York. Such an officer will be simply invincible. There will be no question raised when he speaks or acts with the voice and authority of the people of the whole State. All the people will obey such an officer cheerfully, Liberals and all. But this Agent, Informer, and Spy of a select, incorporated coterie, what power can you give him that will inspire respect, confidence, and obedience? What right can you confer upon him except to prowl around with his revolver as a quasi, semi-religious freebooter, calling himself a "soldier of Christ," gaining his living by foraging on the charitable in proportion to the sensation he can raise.

Your District Attorneys and Police will certainly enter into no competition with a man of this kind. They shrink with disgust when he enters their offices. They will leave the field to him as far as they possibly can, and that, in fact, is just what they do.

4. But with all this sacrifice of law, truth, decency, and secular authority, can this method succeed? It has been well tried as to a large class of offenses by the "Quixotic" Clergyman, Howard Crosby, whose advocacy of falsehood I have referred to, and who has been aided by this very society to the extent of its power. What has been the result? The answer is, An ignominious failure. They have demoralized the police and magistrates, and cannot do the duty themselves.

The Rev. Dr. Potter, of Grace church, a clergyman than whom none could speak with more weight or truthfulness, in a sermon on the perils of New York, reported in the New York Herald of the 14th inst., describes the unfortunate state of things and their cause in these words:

"A voluntary society for the suppression of crime, whose very existence is one of the most startling commentaries upon our sham civilization, since it has been forced into existence to do the work which the law and its executors are both sworn and paid to do; a voluntary association like this created for the suppression of crime, endeavors to shield the unwary and to break up those robber caves and robber bands. It can never happen to find them, and we, whose guardians they are, are apparently no more concerned about this municipal disgrace than if it happened in Dahomey. A Quixotic Divine strives in vain to rouse the public conscience against licensed thieving, and the friends of the thieves laugh in their sleeves at his folly, while the rest of the community think that he had better go back to his preaching. I think so too, for surely the people, to awaken whom this John the Baptist cries so vainly in the wilderness of our New York, are even more closely wedded to their dishonor than the publicans and sinners of the olden time."

Upon this sermon the New York Herald of March 14th comments editorially thus: "Dr. Potter's sermon on 'The Perils of New York,' calls attention to the fact, astounding to all who do not inhabit this city, that societies are organized to do work that the law requires our officials to perform, and that the people do not seem to be indignant about it."

Dr. Potter has recommended the true course to awaken the people and bring the true remedy. Let the "Quixotic" Clergyman and Chancellor, return to his pulpit and lecture room; let this "Agent" return to his dry-goods; let the Governor have the power to hold the district attorneys and the police to their duty. If they fail, let us lay before him the proper charges and have others put in their place who will not fail. This, those whom I represent will do, every good citizen will help to do. Only in this way can the laws be ever safely and effectively executed in a republic.

Third. There is a further and a fundamental reason why this amateur method can never be safe or effective, and that is because it is not, and can never be, impartial. It is subject to a fatal bias.

These vice societies are also, in fact, State libel societies. They cannot for that reason effectively execute the laws. The very first element to secure that end is a popular conviction that all citizens are equal before the law, and that it is executed solely for the public good and not for any ulterior, and least of all for any personal, sectarian, or "religious" purposes.

What are the facts? Any one, and especially one not of their sects, who stands in their way, or questions the propriety of their existence, methods, or conduct, is immediately set upon, shadowed by detectives, and bulldozed by terrorism. His motives are published as the vilest possible, till he is buried under a heap of the filth, rotten eggs, and dead cats and dogs that this agent is always ready to exhume and throw.

Thus he has reduced what open opposition there is against his methods to a skunk warfare in which he is the offensive performer against men a hundred times better than himself. This is the reason that the opponents to his legislation so seldom appear before you, and he is allowed to have his own way. The terrorism, moral and physical, of these amateur bandits has developed a degree of cowardice hitherto wholly unexampled in "free America." You cannot blame any one. There is one animal no human courage is expected to face. That fact is a solid reason for this Legislature to put an end to his legal existence.

I know right well that you have nothing to do with individual grievances, and no wish to hear them. But if it appear that this society has through its "agent" been guilty of libels, suppression of the truth, and misrepresentation of facts, terrorism, and useless dissension among our citizens, and that such evils are inherent in its system and method, it is in the highest degree relevant, and the best possible reason it should approach its end. Be patient, therefore, with the proofs.

This agent has recently published a book called "Frauds Exposed." It is itself a fraud and an exposure of himself, and also that most atrocious libel that has ever yet fallen from the American press. It is cunningly devised and written. Its sensational cant and money-getting object reveal the bigot, fanatic, hypocrite, and self-seeker from page to page to its final cry for money. But only one who knows the facts could believe that any one in human shape could have piled up such a mass of falsehood, libel, and slander.

The title page shows the first point relevant here, for there he gives the work the sanction of "my solemn oaths of office!" Who gave him oaths of office to be prostituted in this way? What right has he to have oaths to use and parade as a defense for libel?

It is not necessary to go outside of this book to find that this official oath-power should cease with this display of it.

The book is written, as it states, for its last or third part, which is designed to bury in its filth all, and especially the Liberals of the country, who have dared to oppose him, his Society, and its methods.

It is simply a libel and a falsehood knowingly uttered as to them individually and collectively.

Let me begin with two specimens as to individuals.

Of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll he says (p. 504), "I assert without fear of contradiction that R. G. Ingersoll has favored obscenity, advocated the repeal of these [U. S. Comstock postal] laws, and sympathized with some of the vilest men convicted of the execrable crime of dealing in obscene publications."

Never was more falshood crowded into so few words.

This Agent knew that Col. Ingersoll has never in any way advocated or been in favor of the repeal of those laws, and it is stated in this very book that he resigned as a Vice-President of the Liberal League because the majority at its Chicago Congress of 1880 were in favor of their repeal.

The Agent knew that the petition which it is said Col. Ingersoll signed was one not for repeal only, as he falsely represents, but contained a prayer for a modification of the Law, which was the course Col. Ingersoll approved and recommended.

The whole prayer of the petition is as follows:

"Wherefore your petitioners pray that the statutes aforesaid may be repealed, or materially modified, so that they cannot be used to abridge the freedom of the press or of conscience, or to destroy the liberty and equality of the people before the Law and Departments of the Government, on account of any religious, moral, political, medical, or commercial grounds or pretexts whatsoever." This last clause this Agent wilfully suppresses.

Col. Ingersoll approved of a modification of these laws substantially as above, and all he did or said was in that behalf. He never appeared with the repealers or for them at any time, as the "Agent" well knew. It is not certain even that he signed the petition and if he did so it was done when he appeared before the committee to explain his views as to modification.

But how Col. Ingersoll advocated obscenity his indignant reply to the charge which fits this Agent shows well enough and is in harmony with his whole life. These words will follow this Agent forever:

"When he made that statement he wrote across the forehead of his reputation the word LIAR. He is a low, infamous man. Meanness cannot descend beyond the level of him who will endeavor to blacken the reputation of another simply because he can not answer his argument. I despise, I execrate with every drop of my blood, any man or woman who wilfully attempts to destroy the reputation of another."

How Col. Ingersoll has "sympathized with some of the vilest men" may be seen by the above utterance. He sympathized with no man for any wrong he had done, but when Mr. Bennett had been unjustly and unfairly prosecuted and convicted he was not the man to withhold his sympathy for the victim and indignation for the wrong-doer. He did not justify any violation of the law, but when he found what had been done under it, he could not help saying:

"I regard Comstock as infamous beyond expression. I have little respect for those men who endeavor to put down vice by lying, and very little respect for a society that would keep in its employ such a leprous agent."

The Agent next (p. 711) states that Col. Ingersoll remained a member of the League after it declared for repeal at Chicago. The Agent knew better. The Washington Auxiliary League of which Col. Ingersoll was a member at once withdrew and took him out of the League and he has never had anything whatever to do with it since. All he could do on the spot he did, that is to resign his office at the Congress. His own Society could only do the rest, and it did it at once.

This Agent knew:

1. That Col. Ingersoll differed from other Liberals in the fact that he never was in favor of "repeal," but always, consistently, of "modification."

2. That he resigned and entirely withdrew from all connection with the League when it declared for repeal.

3. That instead of advocating obscenity he had strained the English language to denounce it and its abettors, and his life illustrated his words.

4. That his expression of sympathy for Mr. Bennett was upon the ground that he had been unjustly prosecuted on account of his Liberal opinions, and not because he had "violated any law of the land," but because he had not.

This "Agent" knowingly and maliciously falsifies as to these four points. Page after page of his words, too profuse and canting to quote, show that he did it in order to destroy him and his influence because he is what the Agent regards as an "Infidel."

This Agent differs from Col. Ingersoll as to religion, and I do as to politics; and slander, like death, loves a shining mark. But the greatest orator of our age is so far beyond his reach that he cannot by this mousing owl be hacked at and torn. Yet it is proof that the detractor who will pervert and suppress truth to do it will do anything, and is subject to no moral restraint whatever. Nothing but the fear of hell will ever keep him from robbing a hen-roost.

To take another instance, this Agent's references to myself if possible eclipse those to Col. Ingersoll. He declares (page 452) that I "pronounce for obscenity under cover of this thin and specious argument for 'liberty.'"

He makes this out by brazenly quoting a sentence from my letter to the Third Liberal League of New York (see Faneuil Hall Speech, p. 5) which I had used to state the position of an opponent for the very purpose of showing that I did not agree with him. My opponent had stated that if the Liberals opposed these laws they would be misrepresented and "fall into the trap of allying themselves with obscenity." I replied: "But suppose you do not oppose them? Do you not then ally Liberalism with bigotry and fatal betrayal of liberty? Is not the latter trap the worse of the two?"

He quotes so far and no farther!

The next sentence would show the truth and leave no semblance of reason for his charge, for I go right on to say: "But why turn this into a trap question? It is not a choice between Scylla and Charybdis. Let us keep in mid-water and on the high sea, trust to pure motives and the breezes of liberty, and traps to the right of us and to the left of us may be safely left behind to catch those who set or think of them."

How wicked and slanderous his talk is about my advocating obscenity the book he held in his hand shows from page to page.

In the next sentence he saw these words: "The Liberal party or sect, like every other in a free republic, will find its justification and victory only in so far as it makes for the good and welfare of the whole people."

And a little further on he read this: "This violation [of the Constitution] has come . . for the worthy purpose of suppressing obscenity. Let me say at the outset that I respect the motives of the persons who have founded the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and who have contributed to sustain it, but they have selected an improper "Agent" and used means unlawful, unconstitutional, and unworthy of them. I wish, therefore, publicly to put my foot upon the libel that I, or others who have signed that petition [for repeal or modification], have so done as the abettors of obscenity or from a desire to give it aid or comfort."

Note how fair I was in stating the good motives of my opponents, and how distinctly I did not "pronounce for obscenity." Passages like the above too numerous to quote and in almost every form occur in that little book which ends (p. 59) with the Liberal watchword—"LIBERTY AND PURITY, now and forever, one and inseparable!"

What will you think of a man who says that in this I "pronounce for obscenity," and who asks in his next line (p. 452), "What will this obscenity defender do about the State laws?"

The bill before you to abolish obscenity and this libeler, both at once, answers emphatically what I would do about State laws.

He next adds, "Is not he lawyer enough to know that the common-law decisions are all against obscenity?" etc., "Is he ignorant of that," etc.

Certainly I know it; and he knows that I have strenuously insisted upon a return to the common law and its methods instead of his Society and its inquisition, and he chooses to falsify, suppress, and misrepresent. That same little book (p. 51) shows how I urged "emphatic approval of the use of all such means as may be within the legitimate scope of government to secure the repression both of the issue and circulation of such [obscene] matter by the press."

The Liberal convention at Watkins in 1878, consisting of thousands, fully indorsed that sentiment.

Again, in the same book (p. 53), he read, as to the common law, my words as follows:

"Here I take my stand [on the Common law]. I shall ask no further limitation of the liberty of printing than that imposed by the common law and the Constitutions of my State and country. I incline to ask the protection of the general public and of youth from having obscenity in any form exposed to their view or foisted upon them by mail, express, or otherwise, but let the offenses be punished by the States and not the Federal government, they only having power to punish such abuses. This is the common law; it is constitutional; it is called for by the cultivated sentiments of mankind; and it is conservative of the morals of youth. If we maintain the residue of our criminal code, let us by no means omit that." That is what I said.

Can the impudence of falsehood go further than to turn from such passages as the above in the very book he quotes from, and say that I "pronounce in favor of obscenity," or that I am a "defender of obscenity," and "ignorant of or opposed to the common law" on the subject?

But his impudence does go further, for he goes right on to say:

"I never saw him [this "obscenity defender"] defend but one case in court in my life, and that was of a vender of obscenity, and his client was convicted."

He never saw me defend any case in court!

But mark the duplicity of this sentence! When branded as a liar and libeler for charging me with being an "obscenity defender," that is, a defender of obscenity itself, this Agent keeps open the door in his last sentence to say, "I meant only that he as a lawyer defended in court persons charged with that offense." But this miserable dodge will not avail. The fact is that I seldom go into the criminal courts at all, and have never defended a case of obscenity in my life, and I never expect or intend to. The public position I felt it my duty to take in regard to this subject at Faneuil Hall, and at other places, made it indelicate and improper for me to act professionally in such cases, and I have never done so. If allusion is made to Mr. Bennett's case, there was, as he well knew, an additional reason why I could not appear for him or defend him, for I had to become his bail to keep this Agent from dragging him off to jail at night, as was his evident intention and wish. True, I befriended Mr. Bennett as I could at his trial otherwise than as his counsel. To compliment me Mr. Bennett, in the report of the trial, included my name. I explained in his paper that it was erroneously inserted, and that I had not acted professionally for him, nor was my advice as to many things asked or taken. Abram Wakeman was his only counsel and the only one who defended "him in court." His name only so appears on the record. This Agent so knew, for he mentions him alone as the counsel, at page 472 of his book. So this mean attempt to escape from a double falsehood with a slur has no ground but the writer's malice.

Other and even meaner individual instances may be noticed were there time; but now a word as to the Liberals collectively.

Music.

Will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER please call the attention of the music men of their acquaintance to this note? I will arrange music for any number of instruments and of any kind. I am an admirer of liberty, and a despiser of hypocrisy.

I think we Infidels ought to hav Infidel bands established throughout the United States; and when the Fourth of July is celebrated, Infidels can hav their bands of music, and can speak praises of honor and admiration to the memory of Thomas Paine. This is a movement that should be attended to. Few practical musicians pay any attention to Freethought. Address me at Aurora, Ohio. B. O. FENTON.

THE Daily Leader, of Binghamton, N. Y., has the following concerning a recent Land League meeting at that place: "A couple of ladies were present during the evening, and the very courteous Secretary, Mr. McGrath, moved them a vote of thanks. Upon its passage, one of the ladies, who proved to be the eloquent speaker, Mrs. H. S. Lake, who has spoken in Leonard Hall several times recently, asked the privilege of making a few remarks, and took the audience by surprise with her eloquence and force of argument. The frequent and enthusiastic outbursts of applause showed how well her remarks were appreciated, and how telling were her arguments against tyranny and in favor of universal liberty to all mankind. Ireland, she said, was cursed and made the slave of England through religious intolerance and the felfishness of greed."

What Objections to Christianity?

OUR EIGHTH LETTER.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: As I have received a private note from you, saying you do not care to reply to my last, we will consider that much settled, and I will proceed with my remarks; though before entering upon our next thesis I will examine the question as to how the books composing the New Testament came to be accepted as the canon, or the veritable word of God.

From what I have already said I think I have made it pretty clear that neither Jesus nor his disciples wrote any of the books of the New Testament, unless possibly it was the first epistle of Peter, which some Christian writers will insist was written by Peter, although it is a matter of extreme doubt. Some of the epistles ascribed to Paul were undoubtedly written by him, while others were almost certainly not written by him. The four gospels were assuredly not written by those whose names they bear, and no one in the world knows who did write them. But these books are now held to be canonical, authentic writings, dictated by heaven, accepted by the church. How came all this about?

At the time, as we have seen, when the four synoptical gospels were first known to have an existence there had been many other so-called gospels floating around, one ascribed to this apostle or saint, and another to that, probably not one of them actually bearing the name of the person who wrote it. Many gospels and epistles were also brought into notice somewhat later than the introduction of our four gospels, many of which have since been rejected and pronounced spurious or apocryphal. In all, there were hundreds of these gospels and epistles, which fact goes to prove that gospel-writing was a pastime or a source of pleasure. It was probably the literary rage of that period. Although they differed not a little from each other, there was a general sameness among them in incident as well as in doctrine.

Among all these conflicting claims of authorship, each gospel and epistle having had its special partisans and advocates, some mode must be devised as to which among them all should be recognized and accepted as the genuine article and which should be rejected as spurious and false. Many bitter and serious contentions grew out of the conflicting claims set up by the advocates of these numerous gospels and epistles, the priests, bishops, archbishops, and even the popes participating in these persistent quarrels. Pope Gelasius distinguished himself by condemning and pronouncing false many of these writings which many before him had considered genuine and worthy of credence. In the latter part of the fifth century he did quite a business at pronouncing false a large number of gospels giving incidents in the life of Jesus and describing the miracles which he performed.

We are informed by the Rev. Samuel Davidson, D.D., in the article "Canon" in the new British Encyclopedia—notwithstanding his sectarian bias—that "oral tradition was the chief fountain of Christian knowledge," and that "the exact principles that guided the formation of a canon in the earliest centuries cannot be discovered. Definite grounds for the reception or rejection of books were not very clearly apprehended. The choice was determined by various circumstances, of which apostolic origin was the chief, though this itself was insufficiently attested, for, if it be asked whether all the New Testament writings proceeded from the authors whose names they bear, criticism cannot reply in the affirmative. The example and influence of churches to which the writings had been first addressed must have acted upon the reception of the books. Above all, individual teachers here and there saw the necessity of meeting heretics with their own weapons, in their own way, with apostolic records instead of oral tradition. The circumstances in which the orthodox were placed led to this step, effecting a bond of union whose need must have been felt while each church was isolated under its own bishop and the collective body could not take measures in common. Writings of more recent origin would be received with greater facility than such as had been in circulation for many years, especially if they professed to come from a prominent apostle. A code of apostolic writings, divine and perfect like the Old Testament, had to be presented as soon as possible against Gnostic and Manichean heretics, whose doctrines were injurious to objective Christianity, while the multiplication of apocryphal works threatened to overwhelm genuine tradition with a heap of superstition. . . . The formation of a Catholic church and of a canon was simultaneous. The circumstances in which the collection originated were unfavorable to the authenticity of its materials, for tradition had been busy over them and their authors. Instead of attributing the formation of the canon to the church it would be more correct to say that the important stage in it was due to three teachers, each working separately and in his own way, who were intent upon the creation of a Christian society which did not appear in the apostolic age—a visible organization united—when the discordant opinions of apostolic and sub-apostolic times should be finally merged. The canon was not the work of the Christian church so much as of the men who were striving to form that church, and could not get beyond the mold received by primitive Christian literature. The first mention of a 'Catholic church' occurs in the martyrdom of Polycarp, an epistle that cannot be dated earlier than 160 A.D., and may perhaps be ten years later. But though the idea be there and in the Ignatian epistles, its established use is due to Irenæus, Tertullian, and Cyprian."

The most of the quarreling before alluded to was done by the councils of priests and bishops which from time to time were convoked to deliberate upon the so-called sacred writings and to decide which the church should declare the word and will of heaven. By the dictum of the contentious councils, where quarreling and fighting absolutely took place, the books were decided upon which should be believed and accepted and which should be disbelieved and rejected, and it later got to this, if any unfortunate person dared to disbelieve or question the truth or genuineness of any of the gospels which the councils had decided were the word of God, he must burn in fused sulphur forever.

The decisions of these councils, however, were not conclusive at the time they were rendered, and it has only been by the lapse of centuries that the church finally settled down in a general acquiescence as to which books should really constitute the word of God to his unfortunate offspring. It might be edifying to mention some of the strong lights in the church who remained attached to certain gospels and epistles after the councils had rejected and pronounced them false, and still insisted that they were more genuine than some which the council had placed in the canon; but I cannot take the space to detail many of these cases. In comparatively modern times not less a divine than Dr. Whiston has insisted that no less than twenty-seven of the discarded books are genuine. "Can any one," says he, "be so weak as to imagine Mark and Luke and James and Jude, who were none of them more than companions of the apostles, to be our safe and unerrring guides, while Barnabas, Thaddeus, Clement, Timothy, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, who were equally companions of the same apostles, to be of no authority at all?" (Exact Time, p. 28.) The Rev. James Martineau insists that several of the apocryphal and rejected gospels are more genuine than the epistle to the Hebrews or even the gospel of Luke. He asks, "If none but the works of the twelve apostles were admitted the rule would be clear and simple, but what are Mark and Luke, who are received, more than Clement and Barnabas, who are excluded?" Archbishop Wake translated several of the apocryphal gospels from the Greek and recommended them as "inspired" and containing "an authoritative declaration of the gospel of Christ to us." The learned Bishop Marsh gave it as his opinion that "it is an undoubted fact that those Christians by whom the now rejected gospels were received, and who are now called heretics, were in the right in many points of criticism, where the Fathers accused them of wilful corruption."

To return to the earlier periods, I will state the truth by saying that from the first century to the seventh there was no fully-authorized canon of the New Testament writings. There were many claimants, and doubt and uncertainty hung over all, when, if there was any truth and reliability attached to those early writings, it would seem they ought to have been certain and satisfactory. It is indeed singular that, if doubt existed about those books then, they should be wholly undoubted and reliable now, and that there is any process by which doubt and falsehood can become certainty and truth. The strength of faith must indeed be great.

The Christian Father Origen, in the third century, is supposed to have been one of the first who took it upon himself to make a selection from the multiudinous gospels and epistles then abounding, and to decide which should be accepted as holy and inspired. His selection was principally the books which compose the New Testament to-day. But of course his opinion, though authoritative to a considerable extent, was far from being fully acquiesced in; quarrels and contentions about God's word still continued. In the year 363 the council of Laodicea was held, and declared what writings should be accepted as God's real word. Their respect for the name of Origen undoubtedly influenced that council to accept and recommend the selection which he had made. Had he accepted some of the apocryphal books and rejected some which are in the canon, they would in all probability have done the same.

No one pretends, I believe, that Origen was inspired to discriminate between the false and the true, or that the bishops and priests composing the council of Laodicea were inspired to accept his selection. They acted simply upon their judgment and prejudices, as many do now when gathered in conventions, legislatures, etc. The arguments pro and con relative to the several books were urged and then the question settled by vote. If by favoritism or influence the majority could have been carried in favor of some books regarded as apocryphal, and against some which were accepted, the canonical word of God would have been of a very different composition from what it is. The good Quaker William Penn made some very pertinent remarks upon the decisions of the council of Laodicea. "I demand," said he, "of our adversaries, if they are well assured of those men who first collected, embodied, and declared them [the New Testament scriptures] authentic, by a public canon, which we read was in the council of Laodicea, held 360 years after Christ—I say, how do they know that those men rightly discerned true from spurious? Now sure it is that some of the scriptures taken in by one council were rejected by another for apocryphal, and that which was left out by the former for apocryphal was taken in by the latter for canonical. Now, visible it is that they contradict each other, and as true that they have erred respecting the present belief" (Penn's Works, vol. i, p. 302, London edition).
